

A Bunch of Everlastings or Texts that Made History-F W Boreham

A BUNCH OF EVERLASTINGS OR TEXTS THAT MADE HISTORY
A VOLUME OF SERMONS
F. W: BOREHAM 1920

CONTENTS PAGE

By Way of Introduction 5

1. I. Thomas Chalmers' Text
2. II. Martin Luther's Text
3. III. Sir John Franklin's Text
4. IV. Thomas Boston's Text
5. V. Hugh Latimer's Text
6. VI. John Bunyan's Text
7. VII. Sir Walter Scott's Text
8. VIII. Oliver Cromwell's Text
9. IX. Francis Xavier's Text
10. X. J. B. Cough's Text
11. XI. John Knox's Text
12. XII. William Cowper's Text
13. XIII. David Livingstone's Text
14. XIV. C. H. Spurgeon's Text
15. XV. Dean Stanley's Text
16. XVI. William Carey's Text
17. XVII. James Hannington's Text
18. XVIII. William Wilberforce's Text
19. XIX. John Wesley's Text
20. XX. William Knibb's Text
21. XXI. John Newton's Text
22. XXII. Andrew Fuller's Text
23. XXIII. Stephen Grellet's Text

BY WAY OF INTRODUCTION

Five and twenty years ago to-night I was solemnly ordained a minister of the everlasting gospel. A medley of most romantic circumstances conspired to fix indelibly upon my mind the profound impressions then created. I was a total stranger on this side of the planet : I had only landed in New Zealand a few hours before. Yet here I was among a people who were pleased to recognise in me their first minister! Trembling under the consciousness of my boyish inexperience, and shuddering under the awful burden imposed upon me by the Ordination Charge, I felt that life had suddenly become tremendous. I was doing business in deep waters! As a recognition of the goodness and mercy that have followed me all the days of my ministerial life, I desire, with inexpressible thankfulness, to send forth this Bunch of Everlastings. Frank W. Boreham. Armadale, Mexborough, Australia. March 15th, 1920.

I THOMAS CHALMERS' TEXT

IT was a mystery. Nobody in Kilmany could understand it. They were people of the flock and the field, men of the plough and the pasture. There were only about one hundred and fifty families scattered across the parish, and such social life as they enjoyed all circled round the kirk. They were all very fond of their young minister, and very proud of his distinguished academic attainments. Already, in his preaching, there were hints of that 'sublime thunder' that afterwards rolled through the world. In his later years it was said of him that Scotland shuddered beneath his billowy eloquence as a cathedral vibrates to the deep notes of the organ. He became, as Lord Rosebery has testified, the most illustrious Scotsman since John Knox. But his farmer-folk at Kilmany could not be expected to foresee all this. They felt that their minister was no ordinary man; yet there was one thing about him that puzzled every member of the congregation. The drovers talked of it as they met each other on the long and lonely roads; the women discussed it as they waited outside the kirk whilst their husbands harnessed up the horses; the farmers themselves referred to it wonderingly when they talked things over in the stockyards and the market-place. Mr. Chalmers was only twenty-three. He had matriculated at twelve; had become a divinity student at fifteen; and at nineteen had been licensed to preach. Now that, with much fear and trembling, he had settled at Kilmarnock, he made a really excellent minister. He has himself told us that, as he rode about his parish, his affections flew before him. He loved to get to the firesides of the people, and he won from old and young their unstinted admiration, their confidence and their love. But for all that, the mystery remained. Briefly stated, it was this : Why did he persist in preaching to these decent, well-meaning and law-abiding Scottish farmers in a strain that implied that they ought all to be in gaol ? Why, Sabbath after Sabbath, did lie thunder at them concerning the heinous wickedness of theft, of murder, and of adultery? After a hard week's work in field and stable, byre and dairy, these sturdy Scotsmen drove to the kirk at the sound of the Sabbath bell, only to find themselves rated by the minister as though they had spent the week in open shame! They filed into their family pews with their wives and their sons and their daughters, and were straightway charged with all the crimes in the calendar ! Later on, the minister himself saw both the absurdity and the pity of it. It was, as he told the good people of Kilmarnock, part of his bitter self-reproach that, for the greater part of the time he spent among them, 'I could expatiate only on the meanness of dishonesty, on the villany of falsehood, on the despicable arts of calumny, in a word, upon all those deformities of character which awaken the natural indignation of the human heart against the pests and disturbers of human society.' Now and again, the brilliant and eloquent young preacher turned aside from this line of things in order to denounce the designs of Napoleon. But as the Fifeshire farmers saw no way in which the arguments of their minister were likely to come under the notice of the tyrant and turn him from his fell purpose of invading Britain, they were as much perplexed by these sermons as by the others. This kind of thing continued without a break from 1803 until 1811; and the parish stood bewildered.

II

From 1803 until 1811! But what of the four years that followed ? For he remained at Kilmarnock until 1815—the year of "Waterloo! Let me set a second picture beside the one I have already painted ! Could any contrast be greater ? The people were bewildered before : they were even more bewildered now ! The minister was another man: the kirk was another place! During those closing years at Kilmarnock, Mr. Chalmers thundered against the grosser crimes no more. He never again held forth from his pulpit against the iniquities of the Napoleonic programme. But every Sunday he had something fresh to say about the love of God, about the Cross of Christ, and about the way of salvation. Every Sunday he urged his people with tears to repent, to believe, and to enter into life everlasting. Every Sunday he set before them the beauty of the Christian life, and, by all the arts of eloquent persuasion, endeavoured to lead his people into it. 'He would bend over the pulpit,' writes one who heard him both before and after the change, 'he would bend over the pulpit and press us to take the gift, as if he held it that moment in his hand and would not be satisfied till every one of us had got possession of it. And often, when the sermon was over, and the psalm was sung, and he rose to pronounce the blessing, he would break out afresh with some new entreaty, unwilling to let us go until he had made one more effort to persuade us to accept it.' Now here are the two pictures side by side—the picture of Chalmers during his first eight years at Kilmarnock, and the picture of Chalmers during his last four years there ! The question is : What happened in 1811 to bring about the change?

III

That is the question; and the answer, bluntly stated, is that, in 1811, Chalmers was converted!

He made a startling discovery—the most sensational discovery that any man ever made. He had occupied all the years of his ministry on the Ten Commandments ; he now discovered, not only that there are more commandments than ten, but that the greatest commandments of all are not to be found among the ten ! The experience of Chalmers resembles in many respects the experience of the Marquis of Lossie. Readers of George MacDonald's Malcolm will never forget the chapter on 'The Marquis and the Schoolmaster.' The dying marquis sends for the devout schoolmaster, Mr. Graham. The schoolmaster knows his man, and goes cautiously to work.

'Are you satisfied with yourself, my lord ?' 'No, by God!'

'You would like to be better ?'

'Yes; but how is a poor devil to get out of this infernal scrape?'

'Keep the commandments !'

'That's it, of course; but there's no time !'

'If there were but time to draw another breath, there would be time to begin !'

'How am I to begin ? Which am I to begin with ?'

'There is one commandment which includes all the rest !'

'Which is that ?'

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!' Acts 16:31

When the Marquis of Lossie passed from the ten commandments to the commandment that includes all the ten, he found the peace for which he hungered, and, strangely enough, Chalmers entered into life in a precisely similar way.

IV

'I am much taken,' he says in his journal, in May, 1811, 'I am much taken with Walker's observation that we are commanded to believe on the Son of God!'

Commanded!

The Ten Commandments!

The Commandment that includes all the Commandments!

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!'

That was the Marquis of Lossie's text, and it was Chalmers'.

At about this time, he was overtaken by a serious illness. He always regarded those days of feebleness and confinement as the critical days in his spiritual history. Long afterwards, when the experience of the years had shown that the impressions then made were not transitory, he wrote to his brother giving him an account of the change that then overtook him. He describes it as a great revolution in all his methods of thought. 'I am now most thoroughly of opinion,' he goes on, 'that on the system of "Do this and live!" no peace can ever be attained. It is "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!" When this belief enters the heart, joy and confidence enter along with it!'

'Thus,' says Dr. Hanna in his great biography of Chalmers, 'thus we see him stepping from the treacherous ground of "Do and live!" to place his feet upon the firm foundation of "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!"'

Do!—The Ten Commandments—that was his theme at Kilmany for eight long years!

Believe!—The Commandment that includes all the Commandments—that was the word that transformed his life and transfigured his ministry!

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!'

V

The result of that change we have partly seen. But only partly. We have seen it from the point of view of the pew. We have seen the farmer-folk of Kilmany astonished as they caught a new note in the minister's preaching, a new accent in the minister's voice. But we must see the change from the point of view of the pulpit. And, as seen from the pulpit, the result of the transformation was even more surprising and sensational. Chalmers alone can tell that story, and we must let him tell it in his own way. The twelve years at Kilmany—the eight before the change, and the four after it—have come to an end at last; and, at a special meeting called for the purpose, Mr. Chalmers is taking a sorrowful farewell of his first congregation. The farmers and their wives have driven in from far and near. Their minister has been called to a great city charge; they are proud of it; but they find it hard to give him up. The valedictory speeches have all been made, and now Mr. Chalmers rises to reply. After a feeling acknowledgement of the compliments paid him, he utters one of the most impressive and valuable testimonies to which any minister ever gave expression. 'I cannot but record,' he says, 'the effect of an actual though undesigned experiment which I prosecuted for upwards of twelve years among you. For the first eight years of that time I could expatiate only on the meanness of dishonesty, on the villany of falsehood, on the despicable arts of calumny, in a word, upon all those deformities of character which awaken the natural indignation of the human heart against the pests and disturbers of human society. But the interesting fact is, that, during the whole of that period, I never once heard of any reformation being wrought amongst my people. All the vehemence with which I urged the virtues and the proprieties of social life had not the weight of a feather on the moral habits of my parishioners. It was not until the free offer of forgiveness through the blood of Christ was urged upon the acceptance of my hearers that I ever heard of any of those subordinate reformations which I made the ultimate object of my earlier ministrations.' And he closes that farewell speech with these memorable words: 'You have taught me,' he says, 'that to preach Christ is the only effective way of preaching morality; and out of your humble cottages I have gathered a lesson which, in all its simplicity, I shall carry into a wider theatre.'

Do!—The Ten Commandments—that was his theme at Kilmany for eight long years, and it had not the weight of a feather!

Believe!—The Commandment that includes all the Commandments—that was his theme for the last four years, and he beheld its gracious and renovating effects in every home in the parish!

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!'

With that great witness on his lips, Chalmers lays down his charge at Kilmany, and plunges into a larger sphere to make world-history!

VI

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!' (Acts 16:31) Chalmers greatly believed and was greatly saved. He was saved from all sin and made saintly. 'If ever a halo surrounded a saint,' declares Lord Rosebery, 'it encompassed Chalmers!' He was saved from all littleness and made great. Mr. Gladstone used to say of him that the world can never forget 'his warrior grandeur, his unbounded philanthropy, his strength of purpose, his mental integrity, his absorbed and absorbing earnestness; and, above all, his singular simplicity; he was one of nature's nobles.' A strong featured man,' said Carlyle, thinking of the massive form, the leonine head and the commanding countenance of his old friend ; 'a strong featured man, and of very beautiful character.' When I want a definition of the salvation that comes by faith, I like to think of Thomas Chalmers.

VII

Yes ; he greatly believed and was greatly saved ; he greatly lived and greatly died. It is a Sunday evening. He—now an old man of sixty-seven—has remained at home, and has spent a delightful evening with his children and grandchildren. It is one of the happiest evenings that they have ever spent together. 'We had family worship this morning,' the old doctor says to a minister who happens to be present, 'but you must give us worship again this evening. I expect to give worship in the morning!' Immediately after prayers he withdraws, smiling and waving his hands to them all and wishing them, 'a general good-night !' They call him in the morning: but there is no response. 'I expect to give worship in the morning!' he had said; and he has gone to give it ! He is sitting up in bed, half erect, his head reclining gently on the pillow; the expression of his countenance that of fixed and majestic repose. His students liked to think that their old master had been translated at the zenith of his powers: he felt no touch of senile decay.

'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved!' What is it to be saved? I do not know. No man knows. But as I think of the transformation that the text effected in the experience of Chalmers; as I contemplate his valiant and unselfish life; together with his beautiful and glorious death; and as I try to conceive of the felicity into which that Sunday night he entered, I can form an idea.

II- MARTIN LUTHER'S TEXT

IT goes without saying that the text that made Martin Luther made history with a vengeance. When, through its mystical but mighty ministry, Martin Luther entered into newness of life, the face of the world was changed. It was as though all the windows of Europe had been suddenly thrown open, and the sunshine came streaming in everywhere. The destinies of empires were turned that day into a new channel. Carlyle has a stirring and dramatic chapter in which he shows that every nation under heaven stood or fell according to the attitude that it assumed towards Martin Luther. 'I call this Luther a true Great Man,' he exclaims. 'He is great in intellect, great in courage, great in affection and integrity; one of our most lovable and gracious men. He is great, not as a hewn obelisk is great, but as an Alpine mountain is great ; so simple, honest, spontaneous; not setting himself up to be great, but there for quite another purpose than the purpose of being great!' A mighty man,' he says again; what were all emperors, popes and potentates in comparison? His light was to flame as a beacon over long centuries and epochs of the world; the whole world and its history was waiting for this man!' And elsewhere he declares that the moment in which Luther defied the wrath of the Diet of Worms was the greatest moment in the modern history of men. Here, then, was the man; what was the text that made him?

II

Let us visit a couple of very interesting European libraries! And here, in the Convent Library at Erfurt, we are shown an exceedingly famous and beautiful picture. It represents Luther as a young monk of four and twenty, poring in the early morning over a copy of the Scriptures to which a bit of broken chain is hanging. The dawn is stealing through the open lattice, illumining both the open Bible and the eager face of its reader. And on the page that the young monk so intently studies are to be seen the words : 'The just shall live by faith.'

'The just shall live by faith!' Hab 2:4

'The just shall live by faith!' Ro 1:17

These, then, are the words that made the world all over again. And now, leaving the Convent Library at Erfurt, let us visit another library, the Library of Rudolstadt! For here, in a glass case, we shall discover a manuscript that will fascinate us. It is a letter in the handwriting of Dr. Paul Luther, the reformer's youngest son. 'In the year 1544,' we read, 'my late dearest father, in the presence of us all, narrated the whole story of his journey to Rome. He acknowledged with great joy that, in that city, through the Spirit of Jesus Christ, he had come to the knowledge of the truth of the everlasting gospel. It happened in this way. As he repeated his prayers on the Lateran staircase, the words of the Prophet Habakkuk came suddenly to his mind : "The just shall live by faith." Thereupon he ceased his prayers, returned to Wittenberg, and took this as the chief foundation of all his doctrine.'

'The just shall live by faith!'

`The just shall live by faith!'

The picture in the one library, and the manuscript in the other, have told us all that we desire to know.

III

`The just shall live by faith!'

`The just shall live by faith!'

The words do not flash or glitter. Like the ocean, they do not give any indication upon the surface of the profundities and mysteries that lie concealed beneath. And yet of what other text can it be said that, occurring in the Old Testament, it is thrice quoted in the New ?

`The just shall live by faith!' cries the Prophet.

`The just shall live by faith!' says Paul, when he addresses a letter to the greatest of the European churches.

The just shall live by faith!' he says again, in his letter to the greatest of the Asiatic churches.

`The just shall live by faith!' says the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, addressing himself to Jews.

It is as though it were the sum and substance of everything, to be proclaimed by prophets in the old dispensation, and echoed by apostles in the new; to be translated into all languages and transmitted to every section of the habitable earth. Indeed, Bishop Lightfoot as good as says that the words represent the concentration and epitome of all revealed religion. 'The whole law,' he says, 'was given to Moses in six hundred and thirteen precepts. David, in the fifteenth Psalm, brings them all within the compass of eleven. Isaiah reduces them to six; Micah to three; and Isaiah, in a later passage, to two. But Habakkuk condenses them all into one : "The just shall live by faith!"'

And this string of monosyllables that sums up everything and is sent to everybody—the old world's text: the new world's text : the prophet's text : the Jew's text : the European's text : the Asiatic's text : everybody's text—is, in a special and peculiar sense, Martin Luther's text. We made that discovery in the libraries of Erfurt and Rudolstadt ; and we shall, as we proceed, find abundant evidence to confirm us in that conclusion.

IV

For, strangely enough, the text that echoed itself three times in the New Testament, echoed itself three times also in the experience of Luther. It met him at Wittenberg, it met him at Bologna, and it finally mastered him at Rome.

It was at Wittenberg that the incident occurred which we have already seen transferred to the painter's canvas. In the retirement of his quiet cell, while the world is still wrapped in slumber, he pores over the epistle to the Romans. Paul's quotation from Habakkuk strangely captivates him.

'The just shall live by faith!'

`The just shall live by faith!'

`This precept,' says the historian, 'fascinates him. "For the just, then," he says to himself, "there is a life different from that of other men; and this life is the gift of faith !" This promise, to which he opens all his heart, as if God had placed it there specially for him, unveils to him the mystery of the Christian life. For years afterwards, in the midst of his numerous occupations, he fancies that he still hears the words repeating themselves to him over and over again.'

`The just shall live by faith!'

`The just shall live by faith!'

Years pass. Luther travels. In the course of his journey, he crosses the Alps, is entertained at a Benedictine Convent at Bologna, and is there overtaken by a serious sickness. His mind relapses into utmost darkness and dejection. To die thus, under a burning sky and in a foreign land! He shudders at the thought. 'The sense of his sinfulness troubles him; the prospect of judgement fills him with dread. But at the very moment at which these terrors reach their highest pitch, the words that had already struck him at Wittenberg recur forcibly to his memory and enlighten his soul like a ray from heaven—

"The just shall live by faith!"

"The just shall live by faith!"

Thus restored and comforted,' the record concludes, 'he soon regains his health and resumes his journey.'

The third of these experiences—the experience narrated in that fireside conversation of which the manuscript at Rudolstadt has told us—befalls him at Rome. 'Wishing to obtain an indulgence promised by the Pope to all who shall ascend Pilate's Staircase on their knees, the good Saxon monk is painfully creeping up those steps which, he is told, were miraculously transported from Jerusalem to Rome. Whilst he is performing this meritorious act, however, he thinks he hears a voice of thunder crying, as at Wittenberg and Bologna—

"The just shall live by faith!"

"The just shall live by faith!"

These words, that twice before have struck him like the voice of an angel from heaven, resound unceasingly and powerfully within him. He rises in amazement from the steps up which he is dragging his body: he shudders at himself: he is ashamed at seeing to what a depth superstition plunged him. He flies far from the scene of his folly.'

Thus, thrice in the New Testament and thrice in the life of Luther, the text speaks with singular appropriateness and effect.

V

'This powerful text,' remarks Merle D'Aubigne, 'has a mysterious influence on the life of Luther. It was a creative sentence, both for the reformer and for the Reformation. It was in these words that God then said, "Let there be light!" and there was light!'

VI

It was the unveiling of the Face of God! Until this great transforming text flashed its light into the soul of Luther, his thought of God was a pagan thought. And the pagan thought is an unjust thought, an unworthy thought, a cruel thought. Look at this Indian devotee! From head to foot he bears the marks of the torture that he has inflicted upon his body in his frantic efforts to give pleasure to his god. His back is a tangle of scars. The flesh has been lacerated by the pitiless hooks by which he has swung himself on the terrible churuka. Iron spears have been repeatedly run through his tongue. His ears are torn to ribbons. What does it mean? It can only mean that he worships a fiend! His god loves to see him in anguish! His cries of pain are music in the ears of the deity whom he adores! This ceaseless orgy of torture is his futile endeavour to satisfy the idol's lust for blood. Luther made precisely the same mistake. To his sensitive mind, every thought of God was a thing of terror. 'When I was young,' he tells us, 'it happened that at Eisleben, on Corpus Christi day, I was walking with the procession, when, suddenly, the sight of the Holy Sacrament which was carried by Doctor Staupitz, so terrified me that a cold sweat covered my body and I believed myself dying of terror.' All through his convent days he proceeds upon the assumption that God gloats over his misery. His life is a long drawn out agony. He creeps like a shadow along the galleries of the cloister, the walls echoing with his dismal moanings. His body wastes to a skeleton; his strength ebbs away: on more than one occasion his brother monks find him prostrate on the convent floor and pick him up for dead. And all the time he thinks of God as One who can find delight in these continuous torments! The just shall live, he says to himself, by penance and by pain. The just shall live by fasting: the just shall live by fear.

VII

'The just shall live by fear!' Luther mutters to himself every day of his life.

'The just shall live by faith!' says the text that breaks upon him like a light from heaven.

'By fear! By fear!'

'By faith! By faith!'

And what is faith? The theologians may find difficulty in defining it, yet every little child knows what it is. In all the days of my own ministry I have found only one definition that has satisfied me, and whenever I have had occasion to speak of faith, I have recited it. It is Bishop O'Brien's:—

'They who know what is meant by faith in a promise, know what is meant by faith in the Gospel; they who know what is meant by faith in a remedy, know what is meant by faith in the blood of the Redeemer; they who know what is meant by faith in a physician, faith in an advocate, faith in a friend, know, too, what is meant by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.'

With the coming of the text, Luther passes from the realm of fear into the realm of faith. It is like passing from the rigours of an arctic night into the sunshine of a summer day; it is like passing from a crowded city slum into the fields where the daffodils dance and the linnets sing; it is like passing into a new world; it is like entering Paradise!

VIII

Yes, it is like entering Paradise! The expression is his, not mine. 'Before those words broke upon my mind,' he says, 'I hated God and was angry with Him because, not content with frightening us sinners by the law and by the miseries of life, he still further increased our torture by the gospel. But when, by the Spirit of God, I understood these words—

"The just shall live by faith!"

"The just shall live by faith!"

—then I felt born again like a new man; I entered through the open doors into the very Paradise of God!"

'Henceforward,' he says again, 'I saw the beloved and holy Scriptures with other eyes. The words that I had previously detested, I began from that hour to value and to love as the sweetest and most consoling words in the Bible. In very truth, this text was to me the true gate of Paradise!'

'An open door into the very Paradise of God!' 'This text was to me the true gate of Paradise!' And they who enter into the City of God by that gate will go no more out for ever.

III- SIR JOHN FRANKLIN'S TEXT

A HEAP of books and bones—and that was all ! One after another, no fewer than forty intrepid navigators had invaded the awful solitudes of the Arctic seas in quest of some trace of Sir John Franklin and his gallant men; and this was the tardy and the meagre reward of those long, long years of search ! On the snow-bound coast of a large but inhospitable island, Sir Francis McClintock discovered an overturned and dilapidated boat. Underneath it, together with a few guns and watches, they found a collection of bones and of books. The men had been more than ten years dead. Sir John Franklin, it was known, from documents found elsewhere, had died upon his ship. His last moments were cheered by the knowledge, which came to him just in time, that the expedition had been successful, and that the long-dreamed-of North-West-Passage had been proved to be a fact. The other members of the expedition, more than a hundred and twenty men, had made an attempt to save their lives by an overland dash. The natives had seen that shadowy and wavering line of wanderers. They were very thin, the Eskimos said, and could with difficulty stagger along. With every mile, some fell out and lay down in the snow to die. Others, according to an old native woman who met them, seemed to die upon their feet, and they only fell because death had already overtaken them. But, of all the members of the Franklin expedition, these were the first whose bones were actually found. And, with the bones, some books ! It was the bones that principally interested their discoverers : it is the books that must principally interest us. For some of these saturated and frozen volumes were once the personal property of Sir John Franklin. Do they not still bear his name ? One of them is a battered copy of Dr. John Todd's Student's Manual. Sir John has turned down a leaf in order to mark a passage that appears on almost the last page of the book.

' "Are you not afraid to die?" '

'No!'

'No! Why does the uncertainty of another state give you no concern?'

'Because God has said to me :

"Fear not; when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee !" ' Isaiah 43:2

There, as though his frozen finger pointed to it, stands Sir John Franklin's text.

II

'The waters! The waters!'

'The beckoning, challenging waters!'

When thou passest through the waters!'

From his earliest boyhood the waters had called him. He lived in an inland town : his parents designed him for the church : he was to be a bishop, so they said ! But a holiday at the seaside makes all the difference. He walks up and down the sands looking out on the infinite expanse of water. He climbs the broken cliffs, and shading his eyes with his hand, watches the great ships vanish over the distant skyline. The unseen taunts his imagination : it alters the whole course of his life. The sight of the sea awakens a tempest of strange passions in his soul. Distant voices call him and distant fingers beckon. To be a sailor ! To be the first that ever burst into some silent sea! His fancy catches fire at the very thought of it !

The waters! The waters!

The call of the waters!

'When thou passest through the waters!'

He yields himself to the impulse that he scarcely has the power to resist. He gives himself to the waters, and he learns the business of seamanship from the most distinguished masters of all time. With Matthew Flinders, the most audacious and the most unfortunate of our Australian explorers, he circumnavigates this great continent; whilst at Copenhagen and Trafalgar he fights beneath 'the greatest sailor since the world began.' He makes friends, too, with men who have sailed with Captain Cook, from one of whom, Sir Joseph Banks, he catches the inspiration that sends him cruising into Arctic seas. But whether in peaceful exploration or amidst the excitements of war, whether in the sunny South or in the frigid and desolate North, he is for ever listening to the voices of the waters. He knows what the wild waves are saying. They are calling him to come. And he obeys. For in his heart he cherishes a wonderful secret. The unknown waters are not as lonely as they seem.

The shining tropical waters!
The frozen polar waters!
The unseen, unsailed waters!

'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee!'
The delightful eyes of Franklin behold a sea of significance in that.

III

A dauntless explorer and a brilliant discoverer was Franklin, but by far the most fruitful discovery of his adventurous life was made in 1820. He was then in his thirty-fifth year, and was undergoing his first experience of the ice-bound North. He was in charge of the overland section of the expedition, and was compelled to winter at Fort Enterprise, a desolate spot half way between the Great Bear Lake and the Great Slave Lake. It was a weird experience—so cold, so dark, so still! In a letter to his sister, written from this outlandish solitude, he speaks of the astonishing way in which, during the intense Arctic silence, his Bible breaks with new beauty upon him. It is not the same book. The surprises grow in novelty and wonder every day. Everything in the sacred volume, and especially the central story—the story of redeeming love—acquires a new glory in his enraptured eyes. In this hushed wilderness of snow and ice, he has abundant time for thought. Such serious reflection, he says, must soon convince a sinner of his guilt, of his inability to do anything to save himself, and of his urgent need of deliverance. 'If, under this conviction, he should enquire, "How, then, can I be saved?" would it not be joy unspeakable for him to find that the gospel points out the way? Christ who died for the salvation of sinners is the Way, the Truth and the Life. Whoso cometh unto Him in full purpose of heart shall in no wise be cast out. Can anything be more cheering than these assurances, or better calculated to fill the mind with heavenly impressions and lift up the heart in grateful adoration to God?'

'How, then, can I be saved?'

'I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Him that cometh unto Me I will in no wise cast out.' John 14:6

He has heard the call of the waters; and on his very first venture into the cold and silent North, he has discovered this! He has found, not only a Saviour, but a Friend. He has received the assurance, on whatever seas he sails, of a divine Presence, a sacred Comradeship; and, to the end of his life, he never ceased to prize it.

IV

The saint is never cast in a mould: no two are alike. On my desk at this moment lie two books side by side. One is the Life of Sir John Franklin, the other is Brother Lawrence's Practice of the Presence of God. Can any greater contrast be imagined? Here are two types of saintliness: neither appears to have anything in common with the other. For one man is a monk: the other is a mariner. The one is a recluse, moving among the cells and cloisters of a Carmelite Monastery: the other travels over all the continents and sails into all the seas. The one is essentially an ascetic: the other is essentially a man of the world. The one is pale and thin and sad: the other is bluff and bronzed and jolly. And yet I am impressed at this moment, not by the contrast, but by the similitude. Let us look for a moment beneath the trappings alike of the monk and of the mariner; and, in each case, let us search the soul of the man.

'I have quitted all forms of devotion,' says Brother Lawrence, 'but those to which my state obliges me. And I make it my business only to persevere in His holy presence. I am assured beyond all doubt that my soul has been with God above these thirty years. Were I a preacher, I should above all other things preach the practice of the presence of God; and, were I a director, I should advise all the world to it, so necessary do I think it, and so easy, too. I cannot imagine how religious persons can live satisfied without the practice of the presence of God: while I am with Him I fear nothing, but the least turning from Him is insupportable.'

Now, had I not revealed the source of these words, nobody could have told whether I had copied them from the conversations of the monk or from the journal of the mariner. They fell from the lips of Brother Lawrence; but they might just as easily have occurred in the correspondence of Franklin. For it was the joy of Franklin's life, and the comfort of his death, that he could never be alone. 'When thou passest through the waters,' the promise said, 'I will be with thee'; and he believed it. The thought runs through all his farewell letters. His leave-taking reminds one of Enoch Arden's.

Keep everything shipshape, for I must go I And fear no more for me; or, if you fear, Cast all your cares on God; that anchor holds! Is He not yonder in those uttermost Parts of the morning? If I flee to these, Can I go from Him? And the sea is His, The sea is His; He made it! divine care; in all the blunt sailor-sermons that he preached to his officers and men amidst the ice, the same thought was always uppermost; and the book, with the leaf turned down at the text, shows that his confidence held out to the last.

The white, white waters!
The cruel and pitiless waters!
The all-engulfing waters!
When thou passest through the waters,
I will be with thee!
In life, and in death, that anchor held !

V

Yes, the anchor held; but the strain upon it was at times terrific. What test, for example, can be more severe than the test of slow starvation? And, more than once, Franklin's faith was subjected to that terrible ordeal. The ragamuffins in the London streets used to call Franklin 'the man who ate his own boots,' and he lived to laugh with them at the joke; but it was grim enough experience at the time. The horror of it invaded his sleep for years afterwards. They are out amidst the snowy vastnesses of the interior when the food fails. They divide into two parties : Franklin leads the stronger men in an attempt to find provisions, whilst Dr. Richardson remains to nurse the more exhausted members of the expedition. The foraging party has no success; and all are reduced to skeletons.

Whilst Franklin and his companions are resting, Dr. Richardson and a seaman of his party come spectrally upon them. They are the only survivors of the group left at the camp ! All are soon too feeble to move. In their extremity a herd of reindeer trot by; but the men are too exhausted to fire! Franklin remembers the promise, and, with thin and wavering voice, leads the party in prayer. And this is the next entry in his journal:

Nov. 7, 1821. Praise be to the Lord ! We were this day rejoiced at noon by the appearance of Indians with supplies !'

'Old Franklin,' so wrote a midshipman to his friends at home, 'old Franklin is an exceedingly good old chap and very clever. We are all delighted with him. He is quite a bishop. We have church morning and evening on Sundays, the evening service in the cabin to allow of the attendance of the watch that could not be present in the forenoon. We all go both times. The men say they would rather have him than half the parsons in England.'

For, after all, there is no eloquence like the eloquence of conviction, and out of the depths of a great and wonderful experience Sir John addressed his men.

The waters!
The wide, wide waters!
The waves on which the Lord was always walking!
When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee!
The cable often quivered, but the anchor held !

VI

'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee!'

Franklin found the Lord walking on all the waters. Lying on my desk is an ancient map of the world which an old pilot showed to Henry the Seventh in the year 1500. One or two continents are missing, but there are ample compensations ! For, all over the unexplored territory, I find written : 'Here be dragons !' 'Here be demons !' 'Here be sirens !' 'Here be savages that worship devils !' and so on. But, on his map of the world, Franklin wrote across all the unknown lands and all the uncharted seas, 'Here is God!' When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee! And he always found Him there.

'When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee!'

Who shall doubt that when, at last, he set out upon that strange voyage on unknown seas which, sooner or later, we must all undertake, he still found the promise true ? When Lord Tennyson was asked to write an inscription for the monument in Westminster Abbey, he composed the lines that are recognised as one of the real adornments of the Abbey :—

Not here! the White North hath thy bones, and thou, Heroic Sailor Soul
Art passing on thy happier voyage now
Towards no earthly Pole!

'Passing!'
'Passing on thy happier voyage!'
'When thou passest . . . I will be with thee! Who, I say, can doubt the Presence Divine on those uncharted waters?'

When, in 1875, at the age of eighty-three, Lady Franklin passed away, Dean Stanley added a postscript to Lord Tennyson's inscription. It declared that the monument in the Abbey was Erected by his widow, who, after long waiting and sending many in search of him, herself departed to seek and to find him in the realms of light.'

Thus, He who is with each of His voyagers when they sail upon strange waters brings them safely home and safely together ; and, in the bliss of arrival and reunion, the fierce storms and the long separations are alike forgotten.

IV- THOMAS BOSTON'S TEXT

A WINDING, zig-zag path ascends the steep green hill beside the stream; and an elderly man, somewhat bent, and leaning heavily upon his stick, is toiling slowly and painfully up the slope. He pauses, partly to take breath and partly that he may turn and survey the exquisite panorama of emerald woodland and sparkling stream. But the grandeur of the silent hills, the perfume of the tossing hyacinths, the chirping of the grasshoppers at his feet, and the haunting laughter of the silvery stream below, all fail to gladden him to-day. The beauteous landscape of leafy wold and laughing water is bathed in radiant sunshine ; yet for him the skies are gray and the earth is wrapped in gloom. His countenance is sad and pensive, for he is conjuring up the memories of happier days. He is thinking of those whom he has loved long since and lost awhile. He knows that this must be his final visit to the enchanting valley that has inspired some of his tenderest poetry. For this is William Wordsworth. He has written 'Yarrow Unvisited,' Yarrow Visited,' and 'Yarrow Revisited,' and now he has come to take a last lingering farewell of the lovely place. He thinks of those in whose sweet society he first explored its flowery fields and forest paths—thinks especially of two. He thinks of Dorothy, his sister, with whom he walked, hand in hand, along these soft and grassy banks in the days of long ago. He owes everything to Dorothy. It was Dorothy who made him a poet. And now Dorothy is ill, so ill that she can never really recover ! Then, turning to the east, he shades his eyes with his hand and looks wistfully towards Abbotsford. For it was Sir Walter Scott who first welcomed him to this delightful spot. Only a few months ago they rambled through these woodland paths together. And now Scott is dead! He who was the life and soul of this romantic countryside will climb its hills and ford its streams no more! To Wordsworth, the rugged slopes and the wooded valleys, the waving grasses and the murmuring torrent, are all lamenting the loss of one who loved them each so well. There are few things more affecting than to find the old familiar places, but to miss the old familiar faces. Wordsworth passes sadly over the crest of the hill to revisit the Yarrow vale no more. Scott is dead ! This was in 1832.

II

We will remain in this same delightful neighbourhood, but we will go back exactly a hundred years. Scott died in 1832. In 1732 an old minister whose manse stood just at the foot of yonder hill, lay dying. He has come to within a few days of his triumphant departure. But, although death is stamped upon his face, and it is known that he will never leave his bed again, it is announced that he will preach on Sunday, morning and evening, as usual! He orders his bed to be drawn up to the window, and prepares to address his people for the last time. Sunday comes. From all the farms and homesteads of that Selkirkshire countryside, ploughmen and shepherds, accompanied by their wives and children, set out early in the morning to hear their old minister's last words. From all round the slopes of Ettrick Pen, from the distant foothills of Broad Law, from the lovely shores of St. Mary's Lake, from all down the valleys of the Ettrick and the Yarrow, little groups of men and women make their way with heavy footsteps to the manse. The church at the foot of the knoll, the church with its quaint old tower, the church in which he has ministered for five and twenty years, is closed to-day. The dying man has turned his deathbed into a pulpit, and the whole countryside has gathered to listen to his last message. The eager multitude stretches far beyond the reach of his thin and wavering voice. But those who cannot hear can at least see his pale, wan face, and note the fire in his eye that even death is impotent to quench. As he sits, propped up by pillows, pleading with his people for the last time, the mountain breezes play with his thin, silvery hair. He exhausts the last atom of his failing strength as he pours out his soul in affectionate admonition and passionate entreaty. His voice falters; the watchers round the bed gently remove the pillows that support him, and he lies prostrate, breathing heavily; the window is closed, and the great black crowd, breaking up into little groups again, melts sadly and silently away. In a few days it is tearfully whispered in every cottage that Thomas Boston is dead. So ended one of the most fruitful and memorable ministries that even Scotland has enjoyed. In 1732, as in 1832, there was sorrow in all that countryside. In 1732, as in 1832, the Valley of the Yarrow was a vale of tears.

III

Whenever I am inclined to pessimism, or am tempted to suppose that modern conditions preclude the possibility of a rich and fruitful ministry, I reflect on the conditions that beset poor Thomas Boston. On the self-same day that witnessed the union under one crown of the English and Scottish realms, on May Day, 1707, Boston settled at Et-trick. The church had but few members, and even these were of such a type that their behaviour was a reproach to the sanctuary. The poor minister, whose heart was still tender at leaving his first people, was horrified to find that his new parishioners could scarcely speak without profanity, and were addicted to lives of the grossest immorality. Their sins, moreover, were absolutely shameless. They were 'smart and of an uncommon assurance, self-conceited and censorious to a pitch.' Even when they came to church, their conduct was disorderly and indecent to the last degree. Many of them loitered about the churchyard, arguing and brawling whilst worship was proceeding ; and elders had to be told off to keep order both inside and outside of the building. It was three years before Mr. Boston would allow the Lord's Supper to be observed among them. 'I have been much discouraged with respect to my parish a long time,' he says in his Memoirs, 'and have had little hand or heart for my work.' For twenty-five years, however, he ministered incessantly to this people. He visited them all in their homes; pleaded with them each in secret ; invited the heads of the household to the manse, and taught them how to conduct family worship. After three years he was sufficiently assured of the sincerity of a handful of his people to admit them to the Lord's Table. Five years later, he is delighted at finding that he has a hundred and fifty devout communicants. Later still, he witnesses the most surprising spectacle in this same valley. People come in streams from far and near to be present at the Communion Service at Ettrick. 'It often reminded him of the Jewish Pilgrims in Old Testament times ascending in companies to Jerusalem to keep their Passover.' When the sacred season came round he had to call in other ministers to help him dispense the mystic symbols. The wilderness had become a fruitful field. The Ettrick manse was every week the resort of eager penitents, who, beholding with amazement the transformation in so many lives around them, were anxious to catch the holy contagion. In every house, family worship sanctified the opening and sweetened the close of each succeeding day. And the old church under the hill was, to hundreds and hundreds of people, the dearest spot that eyes had ever seen.

IV

Did I say that, when they withdrew the bed from the window, and the dying minister turned his face to the wall, his memorable ministry ended ? If so, it was a slip of the pen, and an unpardonable slip at that. It is every man's duty to provide himself with some honest work that he may do when he is lying in his grave. Boston did; for, when the ministry of his lips ended, the ministry of his pen began. For years after his death, Thomas Boston's books were the most popular and most powerful works in Scotland; and, by means of them, the fragrance that had for so long filled the Ettrick Valley was wafted far and wide. Whilst Thomas Boston was lying in his grave, his influence was growing by leaps and bounds. Speaking of one of the books, The Fourfold State, Dr. Andrew Thomson, in his Introduction to Boston's Life and Times, says that within a quarter of a century after its publication, it had found its way and was eagerly read and pondered, over the Scottish Lowlands. 'From St. Abb's Head to the remotest point in Galloway it was to be seen side by side with the Bible and Bunyan on the shelf in every peasant's cottage. The shepherd bore it with him, folded in his plaid, up among the silent hills; the ploughman in the valleys refreshed his spirit with it, as with heavenly manna, after his long day of toil. The influence, which began with the humble classes, ascended like a fragrance into the mansions of the Lowland laird and the Border chief, and carried with it a new and hallowed joy.' And, on the authority of one who lived nearer to Boston's time, he says that for three generations this book was the instrument of more numerous conversions and more extensive spiritual quickening than any other volume he could name. And has not Dr. Thomas McCrie, one of the greatest authorities on Scottish life and literature, who was himself born in the same little Border town in which Boston first saw the light, spoken of The Fourfold State as a book that has contributed more than any other work to mould the religious sentiments of the Scottish people ?

V

Now, where was this lamp lit, and by what flame was it kindled ? From infancy Boston was taught to take religion seriously. Had not his father endured imprisonment for conscience' sake, and had not Thomas, as a little boy, sat with him in his cell to help relieve his loneliness? But when the lad was twelve years of age, the Rev. Henry Erskine, a name that must always hold a charm to Scottish folk, came into the Border Country and began to preach. From every direction people flocked to hear him. John Boston went, taking little Thomas with him. They were deeply moved, and went again. Then, one never-to-be-forgotten day, Mr. Erskine cried out, 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world! Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!' John 1:29

What mountainous words!

The Lamb'

The Sin!

God'

The World!

The Lamb of God!

The Sin of the World!

The Lamb that taketh away the Sin!

'By this,' says Boston, 'I judge God spake to me. I know I was touched to the quick at the first hearing, wherein I was like one amazed with some new and strange thing. Sure I am I was in good earnest concerned for a saving interest in Jesus Christ. My soul went out after Him, and the place of His feet was glorious in mine eyes.'

VI

The day on which that stupendous pronouncement was first made was the day on which the slow evolution of prophecy reached its culmination and its climax. In the gray dawn of history a youth had climbed Mount Moriah, walking by his father's side, asking as he walked one pertinent and tragic question: 'My father, behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?'

`Where is the Lamb?'

`Where is the Lamb?'

The question, once started, echoed down the ages from generation to generation. For twenty centuries it haunted the hearts of men. And then, one day, the people were assembling at Jerusalem for the Passover, the Feast of the Lamb that was Slain. The thought of sacrifice, and especially of the sacrifice of the Lamb, was in every mind. And, as they flocked together to listen to the preaching of a strange, prophetic figure from the desert, the speaker caught sight of a Face in the crowd, a Face such as earth had never seen before. And, forsaking the beaten track of his discourse, he cried out : 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!' The riddle of the ages was read at last !

`Behold the Lamb!'

`Behold the Lamb!'

'I once stood in the valley of the Rees River at the head of Lake Wakatipu,' says Dr. Rutherford Waddell, 'and looked up at the great glacier heights of Mount Earnslaw. Far away up across the mountain brow innumerable rills and streams of water were pouring like silver bars down towards the pine forests that climb the mountain-side. Across vast widths of snow and ice they converged their multitudinous rills; and by the time they had reached the forests they had united their streams into one great torrent. This comes tumbling down, forming the beautiful Lennox Waterfall, and then, leaping forth, it hurries away hence to the plain, singing the song of liberty and life. So all the diverging streams of ancient thought and Hebrew prophecy meet in one great announcement. The long evolution of the ages finds its culmination at last in a living Person : "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!"' Boston heard Erskine repeat that stupendous declaration in a little Border town, and all his heart stood up to greet its deep and awful significance.

VII

But what is that profound significance? The Lamb! The Lamb of God The Lamb that taketh away the Sin! What does it mean? The Lamb stands for two things, two and no more. It is the symbol of Innocence, and it is the symbol of Suffering. These two factors in human experience—Innocence and Suffering—are united in the symbolism of the lamb; and they are united in the eternal scheme of things. For the dark tragedy of human guilt passes through two stages. There is the preliminary stage : the stage in which the guilt of the Guilty is the torture of the Innocent—the father heartbroken at his daughter's shame; the mother weeping over the excesses of her dissolute boy. And there is the subsequent stage, the stage in which the innocence of the Innocent is the torture of the Guilty—Legree tormented by the lock of his mother's hair; Dombey racked in the day of his ruin by the fact that 'every loving blossom he had withered in his innocent daughter's heart was snowing down in ashes on him.' The first of these principles—the torture of the Innocent by the guilt of the Guilty—led to Redemption. The second of these principles—the torture of the Guilty by the innocence of the Innocent—leads to Repentance. The first led the Son of the Highest to become the Lamb of God; the second led to the transformation in the soul of Boston when the great revelation burst upon him.

VIII

The startling proclamation that had so captivated his own heart became the keynote of Boston's historic and epoch-making ministry. 'From the time of my settling here,' he says, 'the great thing I aimed at in my preaching was to impress the people with a sense of their need of Christ.' In his later years Boston became convinced that a good sermon ought to be frequently repeated. He himself preached one sermon again and again and again. Its text was : 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world!' And when the people gathered that Sunday under the bedroom window to hear his dying message, he still urged them with many tears to fix their eyes and their affections upon the Lamb of God. When Boston's sun was setting in Scotland, Wesley's was rising in England. It was in those days that Charles Wesley sang:

Happy, if with my latest breath

I may but gasp His name;

Preach Him to all, and cry in death,

'Behold, behold the Lamb I'

And whilst, in England, Charles Wesley coveted for himself so sublime an experience, Thomas Boston, in Scotland, actually tasted its felicity.

V - HUGH LATIMER'S TEXT

THERE is excitement in the streets of London! Who is this upon whom the crowd is pressing as he passes down the Strand? Women throw open the windows and gaze admiringly out; shopkeepers rush from behind their counters to join the throng as it approaches; apprentices fling aside their tools and, from every lane and alley, pour into the street; waggoners rein in their horses and leave them for a moment unattended; the taverns empty as the procession draws near them! Everybody is anxious to catch a glimpse of this man's face; to hear, if possible, the sound of his voice: or, better still, to clasp his hand as he passes. For this is Hugh Latimer; the terror of evil-doers; the idol of the common people; and, to use the phraseology of a chronicler of the period, 'the honestest man in England.' By sheer force of character he has raised himself from a ploughman's cottage to a bishop's palace—an achievement that, in the sixteenth century, stands without precedent or parallel. 'My father was a yeoman,' he says, in the course of a sermon preached before the King, 'my father was a yeoman, and had no lands of his own; he had a farm of three or four pounds a year at the utmost, and hereupon he tilled so much as kept half-a-dozen men. He had walk for a hundred sheep; and my mother milked thirty kine. He kept me at school, or else I had not been able to have preached before the King's majesty now.' Nor has his elevation spoiled him. He has borne with him in his exaltations the spirit of the common people. He feels as they feel; he thinks as they think; he even speaks as they speak. It was said of him, as of his Master, that the common people heard him gladly. In cathedral pulpits and royal chapels he speaks a dialect that the common people can readily understand; he uses homely illustrations gathered from the farm, the kitchen and the counting-house; he studiously eschews the pedantries of the schoolmen and the subtleties of the theologians. His sermons are, as Macaulay says, 'the plain talk of a plain man, who sprang from the body of the people, who sympathized strongly with their wants and their feelings, and who boldly uttered their opinions.' It was on account of the fearless way in which stout-hearted old Hugh exposed the misdeeds of men in ermine tippets and gold collars that the Londoners cheered him as he walked down the Strand to preach at Whitehall, struggled for a touch of his gown, and bawled, 'Have at them, Father Latimer!' There he goes, then; a man of sound sense, honest affection, earnest purpose and sturdy speech; a man whose pale face, stooping figure and emaciated frame show that it has cost him something to struggle upwards from the ploughshare to the palace; a man who looks for all the world like some old Hebrew prophet transplanted incongruously into the prosaic life of London! He passes down the Strand with the people surging fondly around him. He loves the people, and is pleased with their confidence in him. His heart is simple enough and human enough to find the sweetest of all music in the plaudits that are ringing in his ears. So much for London; we must go to Oxford

II

There is excitement in the streets of Oxford! Who is this upon whom the crowd is pressing as he passes down from the Mayor's house to the open ground in front of Balliol College? Again, women are leaning out of the windows; shopkeepers are forsaking their counters; apprentices are throwing aside their tools; and drivers are deserting their horses that they may stare at him. It is Hugh Latimer again! He is a little thinner than when we saw him in London; for he has exchanged a palace for a prison. The people still press upon him and make progress difficult; but this time they crowd around him that they may curse him! It is the old story of 'Hosannah!' one day and 'Away with Him! Crucify Him!' the next. The multitude is a fickle master. Since we saw him in the Strand, the crown has passed from one head to another; the court has changed its ways to gratify the whims of its new mistress; the Government has swung round to match the moods of the court; and the people, like sheep, have followed their leaders. They are prepared now to crown the men whom before they would have crucified, and to crucify the men whom they would then have crowned. But Hugh Latimer and his companion—for this time he is not alone—are not of the same accommodating temper. Hugh Latimer is still 'the honestest man in England!' His conscience is still his only monitor; his tongue is still free; his soul is not for sale! And so—

In Oxford town the faggots they piled,
With furious haste and with curses wild,
Round two brave men of our British breed,
Who dared to stand true to their speech and deed;
Round two brave men of that sturdy race,
Who with tremorless souls the worst can face;
Round two brave souls who could keep their tryst
Through a pathway of fire to follow Christ.
And the flames leaped up, but the blinding smoke
Could not the soul of Hugh Latimer choke;
For, said he, 'Brother Ridley, be of good cheer,
A candle in England is lighted here,
Which by grace of God shall never go out
And that speech in whispers was echoed about-

Latimer's Light shall never go out,
However the winds may blow it about.
Latimer's Light has come to stay
Till the trump of a coming judgement day.

the lists, dressed in his episcopal habit; and, soon after, Bishop Latimer, dressed, as usual, in his prison garb. Master Latimer now suffered the keeper to pull off his prison-garb and then he appeared in his shroud. Being ready, he fervently recommended his soul to God, and then he delivered himself to the executioner, saying to the Bishop of London these prophetic words : "We shall this day, my lord, light such a candle in England as shall never be extinguished !" "

But it is time that we went back forty years or so, to a time long before either of the processions that we have just witnessed took place. We must ascertain at what flame the light that kindled that candle was itself ignited.

III

Very early in the sixteenth century, England was visited by one of the greatest scholars of the Renaissance, Desiderius Erasmus. After being welcomed with open arms at the Universities, he returned to the Continent and engrossed himself in his learned researches. At Cambridge, however, he had made a profound and indelible impression on at least one of the scholars. Thomas Bilney, familiarly known as 'Little Bilney,' was feeling, in a vague and indefinite way, the emptiness of the religion that he had been taught. He felt that Erasmus possessed a secret that was hidden from English eyes, and he vowed that, whatever it might cost him, he would purchase every line that came from the great master's pen. In France, Erasmus translated the New Testament into Latin. The ingenuity and industry of Bilney soon secured for him a copy of the book. As to its effect upon him, he shall speak for himself. 'My soul was sick,' he says, 'and I longed for peace, but nowhere could I find it. I went to the priests, and they appointed me penances and pilgrimages ; yet, by these things my poor sick soul was nothing profited. But at last I heard of Jesus. It was then, when first the New Testament was set forth by Erasmus, that the light came. I bought the book, being drawn thereto rather by the Latin than by the Word of God, for at that time I knew not what the Word of God meant. And, on the first reading of it, as I well remember, I chanced upon these words, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief." (1 Timothy 1:15) That one sentence, through God's inward working, did so lift up my poor bruised spirit that the very bones within me leaped for joy and gladness. It was as if, after a long, dark night, day had suddenly broke!' But what has all this to do with Hugh Latimer?

IV

In those days Latimer was preaching at Cambridge, and all who heard him fell under the spell of his transparent honesty and rugged eloquence.

Latimer was then the sturdy champion of the old religion and the uncompromising foe of all who were endeavouring to introduce the new learning. Of all the friars, he was the most punctilious, the most zealous, the most devoted. Bilney went to hear him and fell in love with him at once. He saw that the preacher was mistaken ; that his eyes had not been opened to the sublimities that had flooded his own soul with gladness ; but he recognised his sincerity, his earnestness and his resistless power ; and he longed to be the instrument of his illumination. If only he could do for Latimer what Aquila and Priscilla did for Apollos, and expound unto him the way of God more perfectly! It became the dream and desire of Bilney's life. 'O God,' he cried, 'I am but "Little Bilney," and shall never do any great thing for Thee ; but give me the soul of that man, Hugh Latimer, and what wonders he shall do in Thy most holy Name !'

Where there's a will there's a way ! One day, as Latimer descends from the pulpit, he passes so close to Bilney that his robes almost brush the student's face. Like a flash, a sudden inspiration leaps to Bilney's mind. 'Prithee, Father Latimer,' he whispers, 'may I confess my soul to thee ?' The preacher beckons, and, into the quiet room adjoining, the student follows.

Of all the strange stories that heartbroken penitents have poured into the ears of Father-Confessors since first the confessional was established, that was the strangest ! Bilney falls on his knees at Latimer's feet and allows his soul, pent up for so long, to utter itself freely at last. He tells of the aching hunger of his heart; he tells of the visit of Erasmus; he tells of the purchase of the book; and then he tells of the text. 'There it stood,' he says, the tears standing in his eyes, 'the very word I wanted. It seemed to be written in letters of light : "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." O Father Latimer,' he cries, the passion of his fervour increasing as the memory of his own experience rushes back upon him, 'I went to the priests and they pointed me to broken cisterns that held no water and only mocked my thirst ! I bore the load of my sins until my soul was crushed beneath the burden ! And then I saw that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief"; and now, being justified by faith, I have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ !'

Latimer is taken by storm. He is completely overwhelmed. He, too, knows the aching dissatisfaction that Bilney has described. He has experienced for years the same insatiable hunger, the same devouring thirst. To the astonishment of Bilney, Latimer rises and then kneels beside him. The Father-Confessor seeks guidance from his penitent ! Bilney draws from his pocket the sacred volume that has brought such comfort and such rapture to his own soul. It falls open at the passage that Bilney has read to himself over and over and over again : `This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief.' The light that never was on sea or shore illumines the soul of Hugh Latimer, and Bilney sees that the passionate desire of his heart has been granted him. And from that hour Bilney and Latimer lived only that they might-unfold to all kinds and conditions of men the unsearchable riches of Christ.

V

`This is a faithful saying!' That is the preacher's comfort. In the course of a recent tour through Western Australia, I was taken through the gold diggings. And, near Kanowna, I was shown the spot on which, years ago, there gathered one of the largest and most extraordinary congregations that ever assembled on this side of the world. It was whispered all over the diggings that an enormous nugget had been found and that Father Long, the local priest, had seen it and knew exactly where it was discovered. Morning, noon and night the young priest was pestered by eager gold-hunters for information; but to one and all his lips were sealed. At last he consented to announce publicly the exact locality of the wonderful find. At the hour fixed men came from far and near, some on horseback, some on camels, some in all kinds of conveyances, and thousands on foot. It was the largest gathering of diggers in the history of the gold fields. At the appointed time Father Long appeared, surveyed the great sea of bronzed and bearded faces, and then announced that the 'Sacred Nugget' had been found in the Lake Gwynne country. In a moment the crowd had vanished ! There was the wildest stampede for the territory to which the priest had pointed them. But as the days passed by, the disappointed seekers, in twos and threes, came dribbling wearily back. Not a glint of gold had been seen by any of them ! And then the truth flashed upon them. The priest had been hoaxed! The `Sacred Nugget' was a mass of common metal splashed with gold paint ! Father Long took the matter bitterly to heart; he went to bed a broken and humiliated man ; and, a few months later, disconsolate, he died! It was a great day in Hugh Latimer's life when he got among the 'faithful sayings,' the sayings of which he was certain, the sayings that could never bring to any confiding hearer the heartbreak and disgust of disappointment.

VI

`It is worthy of all acceptance!' It is worthy! It is worthy of your acceptance, your Majesty, for this proclamation craves no patronage! It is worthy of your acceptance, your Excellency, your Grace, my Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen all, for the gospel asks no favours! It is worthy, worthy, worthy of the acceptance of you all! Hugh Latimer stood before kings and courtiers, and declared that 'this is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.' Never once did he forget the dignity of his message : it was faithful; it was worthy in its own right of the acceptance of the lordliest ; and he himself staked his life upon it at the last!

VII

Dr. Archibald Alexander, of Princeton, was for sixty years a minister of Christ; and for forty of those years he was a Professor of Divinity. No man in America was more revered or beloved. He died on October 22, 1851. As he lay adying, he was heard by a friend to say, 'All my theology is reduced now to this narrow compass : "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners." ' ' In life and in death Hugh Latimer was of pretty much the same mind.

VI - JOHN BUNYAN'S TEXT

THERE is no doubt about John Bunyan's text. As a lover carves his lady's name on trees, signs it in mistake for his own, and mutters it in his sleep, so Bunyan inscribes everywhere the text that wrought his memorable deliverance. It crops up again and again in all his writings. The characters in his allegories, the dream-children of his fertile fancy, repeat it to each other as though it were a password, a talisman, a charm; he himself quotes it whenever the shadow of an opportunity presents itself ; if it is not the text, it is at least the burden, of every sermon that he preaches. It sings itself through his autobiography like a repeating chorus, like an echoing refrain. By its radiance he extricates himself from every gloomy valley and from every dark-some path. Its joyous companionship beguiles all his long and solitary tramps. It dispels for him the loneliness of his dreary cell. When no other visitor is permitted to approach the gaol, John Bunyan's text comes rushing to his memory as though on angel's wings. It sings to him its song of confidence and peace every morning; its music scatters the gloom of every night. It is the friend of his fireside; the companion of his solitude; the comrade of his travels; the light of his darkness. It illumines his path amidst the perplexities of life ; it wipes away his tears in the day of bitter sorrow; and it smooths his pillow in the hour of death. When a man habitually wears a diamond pin, you unconsciously associate the thought of his face with the thought of the gem that scintillates beneath it. In the same way, nobody can have become in the slightest degree familiar with John Bunyan without habitually associating the thought of his honest and rugged personality with the thought of the text that he made so peculiarly his own.

II

On the opening pages of Pilgrim's Progress we come upon the principal character, all clothed in rags, a heavy burden upon his back, greatly distressed in mind, walking in the fields and crying, 'What must I do to be saved ?'

'Do you see yonder shining light ?' asks Evangelist.

'I think I do,' replied the wretched man.

'Keep that light in your eye and go up directly thereto ; so shalt thou see a gate, at which, when thou knockest, it shall be told thee what thou shalt do !'

The man comes in due course to the gate and knocks many times, saying :

May I now enter here? Will he within Open to sorry me, though I have been An undeserving rebel? Then shall I Not fail to sing his lasting praise on high.

'I am willing with all my heart,' replies Good-Will, the keeper of the gate, 'we make no objections against any. Notwithstanding all that they have done before they come hither, they are in no wise cast out!' (John 6:37)

So Christian enters in at the gate and sets out on pilgrimage. And there, at the very beginning of his new life, stands the first vague but unmistakeable suggestion of John Bunyan's text.

'In no wise cast out!'

'In no wise cast out!'

'Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out!'

There, over the portal of the pilgrim path, stands the text that gave John Bunyan to the world.

III

It stands over the very portal of his pilgrim's path for the simple reason that it stands at the very beginning of his own religious experience. Let us turn from his allegory to his autobiography.

'In no wise cast out!' he exclaims, 'Oh, the comfort that I found in that word !'

'In no wise cast out!'

'In no wise cast out!'

We all know the story of the wretchedness which that great word dispelled. It is one of the most moving records, one of the most pathetic complaints, in the language. Bunyan felt that he was a blot upon the face of the universe. He envied the toads in the grass by the side of the road, and the crows that cawed in the ploughed lands by which he passed. They, he thought, could never know such misery as that which bowed him down. 'I walked,' he says, in a passage that Macaulay felt to be specially eloquent and notable, 'I walked to a neighbouring town, and sat down upon a settle in the street, and fell into a very deep pause about the most fearful state my sin had brought me to; and, after long musing, I lifted up my head; but methought I saw as if the sun that shineth in the heavens did grudge to give me light; and as if the very stones in the street, and tiles upon the houses, did band themselves against me. Methought that they all combined together to banish me out of the world. I was abhorred of them, and unfit to dwell among them, because I had sinned against the Saviour. Oh, how happy now was every creature over me, for they stood fast and kept their station. But I was gone and lost!'

'Gone and lost!'

'Gone and lost!'

It was whilst he was thus lamenting his hopeless condition that the light broke. 'This scripture,' he says, 'did most sweetly visit my soul : "and him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out." O, what did I now see in that blessed sixth of John! O, the comfort that I had from this word !' 'In no wise cast out!'

'In no wise cast out!'

'Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out!'

What was it that he saw in 'that blessed sixth of John' ? What was the comfort that he found so lavishly stored there? The matter is worth investigating.

IV

In his pitiful distress, there broke upon the soul of John Bunyan a vision of the infinite approachability of Jesus. That is one of the essentials of the faith. It was for no other purpose that the Saviour of men left the earth and enshrined Himself in invisibility. 'Suppose,' says Henry Drummond, 'suppose He had not gone away; suppose He were here now. Suppose He were still in the Holy Land, at Jerusalem. Every ship that started for the East would be crowded with Christian pilgrims. Every train flying through Europe would be thronged with people going to see Jesus. Every mail-bag would be full of letters from those in difficulty and trial. Suppose you are in one of those ships. The port, when you arrive after the long voyage, is blocked with vessels of every flag. With much difficulty you land, and join one of the long trains starting for Jerusalem. Far as the eye can reach, the caravans move over the desert in an endless stream. As you approach the Holy City you see a dark, seething mass stretching for leagues and leagues between you and its glittering spires. You have come to see Jesus; but you will never see Him.' You are crowded out. Jesus resolved that this should never be. 'It is expedient for you,' he said, 'that I go away.' He went away in order to make Himself approachable! John Bunyan saw to his delight that it is possible for the most unworthy to go direct to the fountain of grace.

`Him that cometh to Me!

`Him that cometh to Me!

`Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out !'

John Bunyan's text was a revelation to him of the approachability of Jesus.

V

In his pitiful distress there broke upon the soul of John Bunyan a vision of the infinite catholicity of Jesus. Therein lay for him the beauty of the text. In the darkest hours of his wretchedness he never had any doubt as to the readiness of the Saviour to welcome to His grace certain fortunate persons. Holy Master Gifford, for example, and the poor women whom he overheard discussing the things of the kingdom of God as they sat in the sun beside their doors, and the members of the little church at Bedford ; concerning the salvation of these people Bunyan was as clear as clear could be. But from such felicity he was himself rigidly excluded. 'About this time,' he says, 'the state of happiness of these poor people at Bedford was thus, in a kind of a vision, presented to me. I saw as if they were on the sunny side of some high mountain, there refreshing themselves with the pleasant beams of the sun, while I was shivering and shrinking in the cold, afflicted with frost, snow, and dark clouds. Methought also, betwixt me and them, I saw a wall that did compass about this mountain. Now through this wall my soul did greatly desire to pass; concluding that, if I could, I would there also comfort myself with the heat of their sun.' But he could find no way through or round or over the wall. Then came the discovery of the text. 'This scripture did most sweetly visit my soul; "and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." Oh! the comfort that I had from his word, in no wise! As who should say, "By no means, for nothing whatever he hath done." But Satan would greatly labour to pull this promise from me, telling me that Christ did not mean me and such as me, but sinners of another rank, that had not done as I had done. But I would answer him again. "Satan, here is in these words no such exception ; but him that cometh, him, any him; him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out."' "

`Him that cometh!

`Any him! Any him!

Him that cometh I will in no wise cast out!

Like the gate that swings open on hearing the magic 'sesame'; like the walls that fell at Jericho when the blast of the trumpets arose ; the wall round Bunyan's mountain fell with a crash before that great and golden word. 'Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out!' The barriers had vanished! The way was open!

`Him that cometh!

`Any him! Any him!

`Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out!' Here was a vision of the catholicity of Jesus !

VI

In his pitiful distress there broke upon the soul of John Bunyan a vision of the infinite reliability of Jesus. It was the deep, strong accent of certainty that ultimately captivated all his heart. Times without number, he had come with a great 'perhaps' trembling on his lips. 'Often,' he tells us, 'when I had been making to the promise, I have seen as if the Lord would refuse my soul for ever, I was often as if I had run upon the pikes, and as if the Lord had thrust at me to keep me from him, as with a flaming sword. Then would I think of Esther, who went to petition the king contrary to the law. I thought also of Benhadad's servants, who went with ropes under their heads to their enemies for mercy. The woman of Canaan, that would not be daunted, though called 'dog' by Christ; and the man that went to borrow bread at midnight, were also great encouragements to me.' But each was, after all, only the encouragement of a possibility, of a probability, of a 'perhaps.'

Perhaps! Perhaps! Perhaps!

In contrast with all this, the text spoke out its message bravely. 'Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out!'

`In no wise! In no wise! In no wise!'

`Oh! the comfort that I had from this word: "in no wise!" . . . If ever Satan and I did strive for any word of God in all my life, it was for this good word of Christ : he at one end and I at the other. Oh! what work we made! It was for this in John, I say, that we did so tug and strive; he pulled, and I pulled; but God be praised, I overcame him; I got sweetness from it! He passed at a bound from the Mists of the Valley to the Sunlight of the Summit. He had left the shadow-land of 'perhaps' for the luxurious sunshine of a glowing certainty. 'With joy,' he says, 'I told my wife: "Oh, now I know, I know, I know!" That was a good night to me; I have had but few better. Christ was a precious Christ to my soul that night; I could scarce lie in my bed for joy and grace and triumph!'

Perhaps! Perhaps! Perhaps!

In no wise! In no wise! In no wise!

I know! I know! I know!

Thus Bunyan found in the radiance that streamed from 'that blessed sixth of John,' a revelation of the reliability of Jesus!

VII

Those who have studied Butler's Analogy of Religion will recall the story that, in the introductory pages, Mr. Malleson tells of the illustrious author. When Bishop Butler lay upon his deathbed, Mr. Malleson says, an overwhelming sense of his own sinfulness filled him with a terrible concern. His chaplain bent over him and tried to comfort him.

`You know, sir,' said the chaplain, 'that Jesus is a great Saviour !'

`Yes,' replied the terror-stricken bishop. 'I know that He died to save. But how shall I know that He died to save me?'

`My Lord,' answered the chaplain, 'it is written that him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out!'

`True exclaimed the dying man, 'I am surprised that, though I have read that scripture a thousand times over, I never felt its virtue until this moment.

Now I die happy!'

And he did.

So, too, pillowing his head upon the selfsame words, did Bunyan. 'His end,' says Froude, 'was characteristic. It was brought on by exposure when he was engaged in an act of charity. A quarrel had broken out in a family at Reading with which Bunyan had some acquaintance. A father had taken some offence at his son, and threatened to disinherit him. Bunyan undertook a journey on horseback from Bedford to Reading in the hope of reconciling them. He succeeded, but at the cost of his life. Returning by way of London, he was overtaken on the road by a storm of rain, and was drenched before he could find shelter. The chill, falling on a constitution already weakened by illness, brought on fever. In ten days he was dead. His last words were : "Take me, for I come to Thee !" '

'I come to Thee! I come to Thee!'

`Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out!'

The words that had lit up the path of his pilgrimage illumined also the valley of the shadow of death! The words that opened to him the realms of grace opened also the gates of glory! The words that had welcomed him at the Wicket Gate welcomed him also to the Celestial City!

VII- SIR WALTER SCOTT'S TEXT

IT was a very happy bridegroom and a very happy bride that came to Lasswade Cottage early in 1798. They had been married on Christmas Eve; and, after a few days in Edinburgh, had come on to this pretty little home on the banks of the Esk. Walter Scott was twenty-six; not one of his books had been written; no thought of fame had visited him; he dreamed only the .happiness that must be his in the new life that he had so recently entered; whilst she tells him that she is sure that he will rise in his profession, become a judge, and die immensely wealthy. Scott vows that he will make his riverside home the sweetest spot beneath the stars. He takes infinite pains in laying out the gardens and the lawns. In the years that followed he never looked upon any of his novels or biographies with greater pride than that with which he surveyed the mystic arch that he built with his own hands over the gate that opened on the Edinburgh Road. In this romantic home lie spent some of the sunniest years of his life; and, as Lockhart points out, it was amongst these delicious solitudes that he produced the works that laid the imperishable foundations of all his fame. As you stroll about this pretty garden, and mark the diligence with which this young husband of ours has trained all his flowers and creepers, I would have you step out on to the lawn. And here, in the centre of the lawn, is a sundial. Our happy young bridegroom ordered it before his marriage, and it has been made to his design. See how carefully he has planted the creepers around it! And, according to custom, he has had a motto engraved upon the dial, a motto of his own selection. It consists of three Greek words : 'The Night Cometh' Scott was not morbid; he was a great human. But in the sunshine of life's morning he solemnly reminded himself that high noon is not a fixture. The brightest day wears away to evening at last. He horrified his bride-elect by arranging, before his marriage, for a place of burial. 'What an idea of yours,' she says in a letter written a few days before the wedding, 'what an idea of yours was that to mention where you wish to have your bones laid ! If you were married I should think you were tired of me. A very pretty compliment before marriage! I hope sincerely that I shall not live to see that day. If you always have those cheerful thoughts, how very pleasant and gay you must be !' Poor, distressed little bride! But she soon found that her apprehensions were unfounded. Her lover was not as gloomy as she feared. He was reminding- himself that the sunshine does not last for ever, it is true; but, just because the sunshine does not last for ever, he was vowing that he would make the most of it. 'The Night Cometh,' he wrote upon the sundial on the lawn. 'The night cometh,' therefore revel in the daylight whilst it lasts! must work the works of Him that sent me whilst it is day; the night cometh when no man can work.' (John 9:4)

II

The inscription on Sir Walter Scott's sundial must have been suggested by the inscription on Dr. Johnson's watch. Scott was a great admirer of Johnson. In some respects there is a strong resemblance between them. Sir Alfred Dale, Vice-Chancellor of Liverpool University, recently referred to them as 'two of the most heroic and, at the same time, most pathetic figures in the annals of our literature.' Boswell's Life of Johnson, and Lockhart's Life of Scott are, by common consent, the two greatest biographies in the language. The former was a new book, and was still the talk of the town, in the days of Scott's courtship and marriage. And in that noble record of a noble life Scott had read Boswell's account of the glimpse that he once caught of the old doctor's watch. As Dr. Johnson drew it from his pocket one day, Boswell noticed that on its face it bore a Greek inscription. The inscription consisted of the three Greek words, 'The Night Cometh' It reminded the doctor, whenever he consulted his watch, that the daylight does not last for ever. 'Work whilst it is day,' the watch seemed to say, 'for the night cometh when no man can work!'

III

It is 1831. Scott is sixty now. It is thirty-three years since we saw him walking on the lawn at Lasswade Cottage with his bride. Then none of his books were written ; now they are all complete. Fame and honour are most richly his. His poor bride, however, had her wish. 'The burial of your bones!' she wrote, in pretty scorn, in the midst of her preparations for the wedding. 'I hope sincerely that I shall not live to see that day!' She did not. She has been five years dead. The brilliant sunshine of that early day has vanished; life is wearing towards its eventide. 'The Night Cometh!' Sir Walter is spending a day with old friends at Douglas. There is a sadness on his spirit that nothing can dispel; and once or twice, as he strides across old familiar landscapes, his companions catch the glint of tears upon his cheek. It has been agreed that there shall be no company but friends of old standing, and among these is Mr. Elliott Lockhart, whom Scott has not seen for many years. Since they last met, both men have been very ill. In the old days they followed the hounds together, and Lockhart was as handsome a specimen of a Border gentleman as ever cheered a hunting field. 'When they met now,' says the biographer, 'each saw his own case glassed in the other, and neither of their manly hearts could well contain itself as they embraced.' They part at night, Scott promising to call on his old friend in the course of his own homeward journey. 'But next morning, at breakfast, came a messenger to inform us that Mr. Lockhart, on returning to his own house, fell down in a fit, and that his life was despaired of. Immediately, although he had intended to remain two days, Sir Walter drew his host aside, and besought him to lend him horses as far as Lanark, for that he must set off with the least possible delay. He would listen to no persuasions. 'No, William,' he said, 'this is a sad warning. I must home to work while it is called day; for the night cometh when no man can work. I put that text many a year ago on my dialstone, but it often preached in vain.' It may have done. But anybody who surveys the long row of noble classics with which he has enriched our literature will feel that it must still more often have preached with remarkable effect.

IV

The Night!
The Night Cometh!

Was Sir Walter justified in reminding himself, amidst the dazzling sunshine of his wedding bliss, that the night cometh ? Was old Dr. Johnson wise in confronting himself with that stern truth whenever he consulted his watch? Why not ? Is the night an ugly thing? I recall a very familiar incident in the life of Thomas Carlyle. One lovely evening he and Leigh Hunt, the poet, strolled off together amidst scenery that was full of rugged grandeur and exquisite charm. Presently the stars shone out, and added immeasurably to the glory of the night. Both men gazed upon the heavens for some moments in silence; and then the poet, to whose soul they had been whispering of peace and happiness and love, burst into the rapturous exclamation, 'God the Beautiful!' Immediately, Carlyle, seeing only the dread majesty of heaven, sprang to his feet and exclaimed, 'God the Terrible!' And both were right. The Night is Beautiful as God is Beautiful ! The Night is Terrible as God is Terrible! Carlyle dreaded the Night as Scott dreaded it, and as Johnson dreaded it. They all three trembled lest the Night should fall before they had finished the work which they had been appointed to do. 'The only happiness that a brave man ever troubles himself much about,' I find Carlyle saying, 'is happiness enough to get his work done. Not "I can't eat !" but "I can't work !" that is the burden of all wise complaining men. It is, after all, the one unhappiness of a man that he cannot work; that he cannot get his destiny as a man fulfilled. Behold, the day is passing swiftly away, our life is passing over ; and the night cometh wherein no man can work!' And who can forget those sledge-hammer sentences with which he concludes his 'Everlasting Yea' ? 'I say now to myself, Produce! Produce ! Were it but the pitifullest infinitesimal fraction of a Product, produce it, in God's name! 'Tis the utmost thou hast in thee; out with it, then ! Up; up! Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy whole might! Work while it is called To-day; for the Night cometh, wherein no man can work!' And so twice, at least, I find the Sage of Chelsea emphasising the text that made the Wizard of the North.

`The Night Cometh!' says Dr. Johnson, and he has the words inscribed upon the face of his watch.

`The Night Cometh!' says Sir Walter Scott, and he has the words engraved on the sundial on the lawn at Lasswade Cottage.

`The Night Cometh!' says Thomas Carlyle in the pages of his first book, a book that was written among the mosshags of Craigenputtock before the world had even heard his name. `Work while it is called To-day; for the Night cometh, wherein no man can work.'

And these three—Johnson, Scott and Carlyle—became three of the most prodigious workers• of all history.

V

`The Night Cometh!' It came to Dr. Johnson, the Night that he had dreaded for so long! 'The infirmities of age,' says Macaulay, 'were creeping fast upon him. That inevitable event of which he never thought without horror was brought near to him; and his whole life was darkened by the shadow of death.' It is not pleasant reading. Let us turn the page! And what is this? 'When at length the moment, dreaded through so many years, came close, the dark cloud passed away from Johnson's mind. His temper became unusually patient and gentle; he ceased to think with terror of death, and of that which lies beyond death; and he spoke much of the mercy of God and of the propitiation of Christ.' His faith triumphed over all his fears; he talked with rapture of the love of God; he pointed his friends to the Cross; and he confidently resigned his soul to his Saviour. 'The Night Conteth f he had said to himself with a shudder, over and over and over again. But when it came, that night was as tranquil as an infant's slumber and illumined by a million stars. The night that follows a great day's work well done is never a. very terrible affair.

VI

`The Night Cometh!' It came to Sir Walter Scott, the Night of which the sundial had spoken so effectively and so long. We have all dwelt with lingering fondness on that closing scene. Here he is, at Abbotsford, surrounded by his grandchildren and his dogs. He is too feeble to rise, but, at his desire, they wheel him round the lawns in a bath-chair. He strokes the hair of the children ; pats the dogs on the heads; and pauses to admire his favourite roses.

'I have seen much in my time,' he whispers softly, `but nothing like my ain house—give me one turn more!'

Exhausted by his ride, and by the tumult of emotions that it has awakened, the dying man is put to bed. Next morning he asks to be wheeled into the library. They place his chair against the central window that he may look down on the shining waters of the Tweed. He glances round upon the shelves containing his thousands of beloved books.

`Read to me!' he says to Lockhart.

`From what book shall I read?'

'Need you ask ? There is but one !'

Lockhart takes down the Bible, and opens it at the fourteenth chapter of the Gospel of John.

`Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Ale. In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you . . .' And so on. The matchless cadences that have soothed and softened and sweetened a million deathbeds fall like a foretaste of the eternal harmonies upon the sick man's ear.

'This is a great comfort—a great comfort,' he murmurs.

He lingers for a while; but the atmosphere of that conversation by the library window enfolds him to the last. The Night comes; and with the Night come weariness and restfulness and tired hands gently folded.

VII

There is only one way of preparing for the night. We must work ! That is what Jesus said. `We must work while it is called To-day; the Night cometh when no man can work!' A good day's work means a good night's rest. Johnson and Scott and Carlyle had learned that secret, but it was from Him that they learned it. And they became the men that they were because they took His words and engraved them on their watches and on their sundials. Yes, on their watches and on their sundials—and on their hearts!

VIII -OLIVER CROMWELL'S TEXT

OLIVER CROMWELL ranks among the giants. Mr. Frederic Harrison sets his name among the four greatest that our nation has produced. Carlyle's guffaw upon hearing this pretty piece of patronage would have sounded like a thunderclap! Four, indeed ! Carlyle would say that the other three would look like a trio of travelling dwarfs grouped about a colossus when they found themselves in the company of Oliver Cromwell. Carlyle can see nothing in our history, nor in any other, more impressive than the spectacle of this young farmer leaving his fields in Huntingdonshire, putting his plough in the shed, and setting out for London to hurl the king from his throne, to dismiss the Parliament, and to reconstitute the country on a new and better basis. He was the one Strong Man ; so much stronger than all other men that he bent them to his will and dominated the entire situation. Cromwell made history wholesale. How ? That is the question—How' And what if, in our search for an answer to that pertinent question, we discover that it was by means of a text!' Let us go into the matter.

II

My suspicions in this direction were first aroused by reading a letter that Cromwell wrote to his cousin, Mrs. St. John, before his public career had begun. In this letter he refers to himself as 'a poor creature.' I am sure,' he says, 'that I shall never earn the least mite.' Here is strange language for a man who, confident of his resistless strength, will soon be overturning thrones and tossing crowns and kingdoms hither and thither at his pleasure! Is there nothing else in the letter that may help us to elucidate the mystery? There is! He goes on to tell his cousin that, after all, he does not entirely despair of himself. Just one ray of hope has shone upon him, one star has illumined the blackness of his sky. 'One beam in a dark place,' he says, 'hath much refreshment in it!' He does not tell his cousin what that ray of hope is; he does not name that solitary star; he does not go into particulars as to that 'one beam in a dark place.' But we, for our part, must prosecute our investigations until we have discovered it.

III

It is sometimes best to start at the end of a thing and to work backwards to the beginning. We will adopt that plan in this instance. One who was present at the closing scene has graphically described it for us. 'At Hampton Court,' he says, 'being sick nigh unto death, and in his bed-chamber, Cromwell called for his Bible and desired an honourable and godly person to read unto him that passage in the fourth of Philippians which saith, "I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me." (Phil 4:13) Which read, he observed, "This scripture did once save my life, when my eldest son, poor Robert, died, which went as a dagger to my heart, indeed it did !" '

This does not tell us much; but it sets our feet in the path that may lead to more. And at any rate it makes clear to us what that 'one beam' was that so often had much refreshment in it. 'I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth

IV

Groping our way back across the years by the aid of the hint given us in those dying words, we come upon that dark and tragic day, nineteen years earlier, when the 'son of good promise' died. Unfortunately, the exact circumstances attending the death of the young man have never been recorded. Even the date is shrouded in mystery. Nobody knows in which battle he fell. Perhaps the father was too full of grief and bitterness to write for us that sad and tragic tale. All that we know is what he told us on his deathbed. He says that 'it went like a dagger to my heart, indeed it did' ; and he says that it brought to his aid the text—the 'one beam in a dark place'—that saved his life. It was not the first time, as we shall see, that that animating and arousing word had come, like a relieving army entering a beleaguered city, to his deliverance. But the pathos of that heart-breaking yet heart-healing experience impressed itself indelibly upon his memory; the talc was written in tears; it rushed back upon him as he lay a-dying; and very often, in the years that lay between his son's death and his own, he feelingly referred to it. In July, 1644, for example, I find him writing a letter of sympathy to Colonel Valentine Walton, whose son has also fallen on the field of battle. And in this noble yet tender epistle, Cromwell endeavours to lead the stricken father to the fountains of consolation at which he has slaked his own burning thirst. 'Sir,' he says, 'God hath taken away your eldest son by a cannon-shot. You know my own trials this way, but the Lord supported me. I remembered that my boy had entered into the happiness we all pant for and live for. There, too, is your precious child, full of glory, never to know sin or sorrow any more. He was a gallant young man, exceedingly gracious. God give you His comfort! You may do all things through Christ that strengthenetiz us. Seek that, and you shall easily bear your trial. The Lord be your strength !'

'I can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth me!'

`This scripture,' he says, as he lies upon his deathbed, 'did once save my life!'

`Seek that!' he says to Colonel Walton, 'seek that! seek that!'

V

But we must go back further yet. We are tracing the stream, but we have not reached the fountainhead. That deathbed testimony at Hampton Court was delivered in 1658. It was in 1639, or thereabouts, that Robert, his eldest son, was lying dead. On each of these occasions the text wonderfully supported him. But, in each case, it came to him as an old friend and not as a new acquaintance. For it was in 1638—the year before Robert's death and twenty years before the father's—that Cromwell wrote to his cousin, Mrs. St. John, about the `one beam in a dark place that hath such exceedingly great refreshment in it.' When, then, did that beam break upon his darksome path for the first time?

Carlyle thinks that it was in 1623. Cromwell was then in his twenty-fourth year, with all his life before him. But we may as well let Carlyle speak for himself. 'At about this time took place,' he says, 'what Cromwell, with unspeakable joy, would name his conversion. Certainly a grand epoch for a man ; properly the one epoch; the turning-point which guides upwards, or guides downwards, him and his activities for evermore ! Wilt thou join with the Dragons ; wilt thou join with the Gods? Oliver was henceforth a Christian man; believed in God, not on Sundays only, but on all days, in all places, and in all cases.'

In 1623 it was, then : but how? Piecing the scraps together, a mere hint here and a vague suggestion there, I gather that it was somewhat in this way. In 1623 all things were rushing pellmell towards turgid crisis, wild tumult and red revolution. At home and abroad the outlook was as black as black could be. The world wanted a man, a good man, a great man, a strong man, to save it. Everybody saw the need; but nobody could see the man. Down in Huntingdonshire a young farmer leans on the handles of his plough.

`The world needs a man, a good man, a great man, a strong man!' says his Reason. And then he hears another voice.

`Thou art the man cries his Conscience, with terrifying suddenness ; and his hands tremble as they grasp the plough.

That evening, as he sits beside the fire, his young wife opposite him, and little Robert in the cot by his side, he takes down his Bible and reads. He turns to the epistle to the Philippians, at the closing chapter. He is amazed at the things that, by the grace divine, Paul claims to have learned and achieved.

`It's true, Paul,' he exclaims, 'that you have learned this and attained to this measure of grace; but what shall I do ? Ah, poor creature, it is a hard, hard lesson for me to take out ! I find it so!' Poring over the sacred volume, however, he makes the discovery of his lifetime. 'I came,' he says, 'to the thirteenth verse, where Paul saith, "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Then faith began to work, and my heart to find comfort and support; and I said to myself, "He that was Paul's Christ is my Christ too!" And so I drew water out of the Wells of Salvation!'

And now we have reached the fountain-head at last!

VI

And so the clodhopper became the king! It was the text that did it! Considered apart from the text, the life of Cromwell is an insoluble mystery, a baffling enigma. But take one good look at the text: observe the place that it occupied in Cromwell's heart and thought : and everything becomes plain. 'That such a man, with the eye to see and with the heart to dare, should advance, from post to post, from victory to victory, till the Huntingdon Farmer became, by whatever name you call him, the acknowledged Strongest Man in England, virtually the King of England, requires,' says Carlyle, `no magic to explain it.' Of course not! The text explains it. For see!

What is a king? In his French Revolution, Carlyle says that the very word 'king' comes from Kon-ning, Can-ning, the Man Who Can, the Man Who is Able! And that is precisely the burden of the text.

`I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me'; so the Authorised Version has it.

`In Him who strengthens me I am able for anything'; so Dr. Moffatt translates the words.

`For all things I am strong in Him who makes me able'; thus Bishop Moule renders it.

A King, says Carlyle, is an Able Man, a Strong Man, a Man who Can. Here is a ploughman who sees that the world is perishing for want of just such a King. How can he, weak as he is, become the world's Strong Man, the world's Able Man, the world's King? The text tells him.

`I can do all things,' he cries, 'through Him that strengtheneth me!'

The Strong Man was made and the world was saved.

VII

A man—at any rate such a man as Cromwell—can never be content to enjoy such an experience as this alone. No man can read the Life or Letters of the Protector without being touched by his solicitude for others. He is forever anxious that his kindred and friends should drink of those wondrous waters that have so abundantly refreshed and invigorated him. After quoting his text to Colonel Walton, he urges him to seek that same strengthening grace which he himself has received.

‘Seek that!’ he says; ‘seek that!’

It is the keynote of all his correspondence. ‘I hope,’ he writes to the Mayor of Hursley in 1650, ‘I hope you give my son good counsel; I believe he needs it. He is in the dangerous time of his age, and it is a very vain world. O how good it is to close with Christ betimes ! There is nothing else worth looking after !’

‘Seek that strength!’ he says to Colonel Walton. ‘Seek that Saviour!’ he says to his wayward son. ‘Seek that which will really satisfy!’ he says to his daughter.

It always seems to me that the old Puritan’s lovely letter to that daughter of his, the letter from which I have just quoted, is the gem of Carlyle’s great volume. Bridget was twenty-two at the time. ‘Your sister,’ her father tells her, ‘is exercised with some perplexed thoughts. She sees her own vanity and carnal mind, and bemoaning it, she seeks after what will satisfy. And thus to be a seeker is to be of the best sect next to a finder, and such an one shall every faithful humble seeker be at the end. Happy seeker ; happy finder ! Dear heart, press on! Let not husband, let not anything cool thy affections after Christ!’

With which strong, tender, fatherly words from the old soldier to his young daughter we may very well take our leave of him.

IX - FRANCIS XAVIER'S TEXT

It is one of the most stirring dramas of the faith—a drama in three acts.

Scene: ‘Neatly the Shadow of the Pyrenees.’

He is a gay young cavalier. It is the golden age of Spanish story. Ferdinand and Isabella have brought the whole world to their feet. Castile speaks ; the peoples tremble; no dog dares bark. Spain is mistress of mart and of main. Columbus has just added a new hemisphere to her wide dominions. The atmosphere of Europe is trilling with music and tingling with sensation. And, in the very year in which the discoverer of America died, our cavalier is born. His home—a splendid palace—adorns the pine-clad slopes of the stately Pyrenees. Its turrets seem to point proudly to the snow-clad heights that glitter gloriously above. He was cradled in the lap of luxury. He caught the spirit of the romantic period, and flung himself with a will into its revelries and chivalries. Life becomes a frolic to him. He is a champion in every tussle for the trophies of the field; he is first in every contest for the laurels of the schools. In running and in fencing, in singing and in dancing, he is without a rival. The chalice of life sparkles as he lifts it to his lips, and his eyes gleam as he quaffs the intoxicating cup. In camp, in castle and in court none are more admired, more applauded, more beloved. He is the darling of society. And so, amid scenes of splendour and of gaiety, denied nothing that can minister to his vanity or increase his delight, five-and-thirty years whirl themselves merrily away.

II

Scene: By the Banks of the Seine.

He is in Paris. Even now, in the early part of the sixteenth century, it is a centre of gaiety. He is in his thirty-sixth year. His enthusiasm for pleasure has yielded somewhat to his thirst for knowledge, and his love of learning has begotten a laudable desire to teach. He is lecturing; and among his hearers a strange, ungainly figure hovers in the background. This student of his is a man of fifty, but looks older still. His name is Ignatius Loyola. He is bent and broken, and is pitifully lame. But the fire of a holy enthusiasm burns in his eye. He has marked the brilliant young teacher for his own, and is determined to win him. He makes friends. After each utterance he congratulates the lecturer, and adds significantly : ‘But what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

The whole world! His own soul!
To gain the world! To lose his soul!

‘What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’ (Mark 8:36)

He lounges with the lecturer in the solitude of the study, he accompanies him in his evening walks along the banks of the Seine ;

they explore together the dense woodlands which occupy the site of future Parisian suburbs. But whether in springtide rambles among the lilies and the daffodils, or in riverside strolls by sunset, or in halls of feasting and music and pleasure, or in silent study, or in the stately academy, the strange student asks, and repeats, and asks again one incessant question :

Tut what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

The whole world! His own soul!

To gain the world! To lose his soul!

Tut what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

A hundred times, as he painfully hobbles along beside his brilliant young master, the deformed pupil reiterates his unanswerable query. And at last, the master mind capitulates to the pitiless and resistless logic of that immortal question. The great professor becomes the lowliest of penitents. Student and lecturer kneel side by side, and, in a tempest of tears, the young lecturer dedicates all that is left of life to that Saviour into whose awful presence his student has ushered him. The lecturer has learned more from his listener than he could ever have imparted.

III

Scene: On the Seashore of Siam.

He is a monk. His face is drawn with suffering. Fasts and vigils have left their mark. But, great as are the tortures of his body, the anguish of his mind is greater. Still. Having himself heard the Story of the Cross, a new idea haunts and possesses him. He is horrified by the fearful reflection that the nations sit in darkness and know not the light which has irradiated him. Not a moment must be lost! Thousands are dropping daily into Christless graves! It is an alarming and terrifying discovery! He will set out at once, and the peoples shall hear from his own lips the story of redeeming love! There are no trains or coaches. He will tramp through the world till his limbs are swollen and his nerves are numb. He sets out. He visits India, and hastening from province to province, picks up the languages as he goes along by happy intercourse with little children. He stands one day amidst the dazzling splendour of an Oriental palace; on the next, he pays court to a rajah and his native staff; on the third he moves amongst the filthy huts of the fisher-folk of Malabar. But every day, and everywhere, he tells with agony and tears, his strange and wondrous tale. Ridiculed, stoned and persecuted, he presses tirelessly on, always uplifting the Cross with his right hand, and with his left, ringing the bell that summons the people to attend. Having made converts, and planted churches, he loses not an hour, but hurries off in search of fresh fields to add to his Divine conquest. He labours for twenty-one hours out of every twenty-four. In the course of ten short years he learns and preaches in twenty different languages. Now he begs a passage in a troopship, and anon he sails with idolatrous pirates and blasphemous corsairs. He tumbles about the oceans in vessels that would not now be permitted to navigate a river. And at sea, as on land, the passion of his sacred purpose consumes him still. He haunts the fore-castle, pleading, one by one, with every soldier and sailor on the troopship. He proclaims to robbers and to slaves the glowing words of life eternal. Across burning deserts and over snowy ranges he threads his fearless way. The fierce blaze of equatorial suns, and the piercing cold of slippery mountain glaciers, alike fail to baffle or deter him. He throws himself into scenes of battle and of carnage that he may strive for the souls of the wounded and the dying. Whilst the very earth rocks beneath his feet, he stands on the shuddering slopes of blazing volcanoes that, amidst scenes of exquisite and majestic horror, he may urge the panic-stricken natives to flee from the wrath to come. He visits leper settlements, and, with all the tenderness of a woman, nurses hideous human wrecks the very sight of whom would sicken a less intrepid spirit. He boards ships whose crews are perishing of loathsome pestilence, and, unafraid of contracting their disgusting maladies, he ministers to the diseased, and kneels beside the prostrate forms of the dying. He comes like a ghost upon wild, untutored inland tribes; he bursts into the island territories of fierce and untamed cannibals. He invades the secret lair of the bandit, and penetrates to the lonely tent of the Bedouin. He passes spectrally from shore to shore. He startles armies on the march, and arrests the progress of the journeying caravan. His limbs are often paralysed with fatigue. He tramps across continents until, from sheer exhaustion, he drops upon the hard and inhospitable soil; and then, having rested for an hour, he rises and staggers on again. He dares death in every form; he shakes hands with every ailment and disease; he endures all the pangs of hunger and all the horrors of thirst; he suffers desolating shipwreck and bitter persecution. He can rejoice in any privation if he may but uplift the Cross on every shore, and preach the gospel to every creature. And it is always observed that, on whatever coast he lands, and in whatever language he preaches, whether he addresses the nabobs of Mysore or the Mikado of Japan, whether he speaks on the deck of a pirate or in the hovel of a slave, he echoes endlessly one everlasting question :

But what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

The whole world! His own soul!

To gain the world! To lose his soul!

‘What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?’

At last, absolutely worn out after ten short strenuous years, at the age of forty-five, he lays his wasted, worn, emaciated frame upon the sea-beach of Siam, and, unnursed and untended, resigns his soul to God. He dies, as he lived, with a smile upon his face. His winsomeness was as wonderful as his daring. Little children simply revelled in his company. His life is the most stinging rebuke that history has ever administered to apathy. His record is a stimulus to every church, and a challenge to every age. It must quicken the blood, and fire the fervour, of good men till his great Master come. It will accelerate the triumphant progress of all noble enterprises till time shall be no more.

* * * * *

And the rest of the acts of Francis Xavier, and all that he did, and the things that he suffered, and the peoples that he reached, and the churches that he planted, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of Christendom?

X - J. B. GOUGH'S TEXT

HE is an old man of twenty-five ! Nobody, seeing him to-night, would suspect that he had seen so few winters; and nobody would suspect that forty-four summers, filled with sunshine and with song, lie between him and his grave. Here he sits at a bare table, in an empty, cheerless room. He shivers, for he is hungry, and he is insufficiently clad. His thin arms are folded on the table, and his haggard face rests upon them. He feels that he has come to the fag-end of everything. He has just completed seven dark and dreadful years. 'During those years,' as he himself tells us, with a shudder, in the brighter after-days, 'during those years I wandered over God's beautiful earth like an unblessed spirit. It was like being driven by whips across a burning desert : I was forever digging deep wells to quench my maddening thirst, and forever bringing up nothing but the hot, dry sand! Seven years of darkness! Seven years of slavery ! Seven years of dissipation! Seven years of sin!'

But let us not be too swift to pity ! Pity, like charity, must be intelligent ; it is too sacred a thing to be wasted or squandered. It does not follow, because this man is ragged and wretched, that he is therefore poor. He is rich; and it is only in such extremities of distress that men discover their buried wealth. To-night, sitting in despair within this squalid room, he suddenly finds himself possessed of incalculable treasure! Memory yields up her golden hoard ! There rush back upon him the tender, hallowed, clustering associations of his early days : the village church, the Sunday School, and, best of all, the dear old English home. As he sits here in this squalid room, his outer-self is on one side of the Atlantic whilst his inmost soul is on the other. His gaunt frame, disfigured by the life that he has lived, is in Massachusetts; but his heart, flying on the wings of fancy, is back among the sweet and fragrant fields of his Kentish home. And, the centre and soul of all those radiant recollections, he sees the sad and wistful face of his mother. His face is still buried in his ragged sleeves, so the tears do not show; but they are there.

'Oh, that mother of mine!' Gough used to say; 'she was one of Christ's nobility, and she possessed a patent signed and sealed with His redeeming blood ! She was poor in purse, but rich in piety; a brave, godly woman ! She died a pauper and was buried without a shroud and without a prayer ; but she left her children a legacy that has made them wealthier than peers and princes! I remember one night, towards the close of her life, sitting with her in the garret, and we had no candle.

She said to me, "John, I am growing blind ; I don't feel it much; but you are young, and it is hard for you to have a poor, blind mother. But never mind, John; there is no night in heaven and no need of any candle there; the Lamb is the light thereof !" Oh, that mother of mine! She is neither poor nor blind now ; she has left that dark and gloomy garret to bask in the sunshine of her Saviour's smiles! And it was his mother, or at least the fond, clear memory of his mother, that came to his relief in the hour of his most dire extremity. That is a way that mothers have! But let him tell the story in his own way.

'All at once,' he says, 'it seemed as if the very light she left as she passed had spanned the dark chasm of those seven dreadful years, struck the heart, and opened it. The passages of Scripture that she had taught me, and that had been buried in my memory, came to me as if they were being whispered in my ear by the loving lips of my mother herself. "He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him." (Hebrews 7:25) It is the very thing I need! I want to be saved—I cannot save myself—He is able to save to the uttermost!—Then He is the Saviour for me!'

I said that, poor as he seemed, this youth of twenty-five owned 'buried treasure' !

That text, he says, was 'buried in my memory!' 'He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him!'

See, he rises at last; draws his sleeve across his eyes; pulls himself together; and, clutching at that text as a drowning man clutches at his rescuer's hand, he walks out of that cheerless room in the power of an endless life.

II

This, then, was J. B. Gough's text. Not that he held any proprietary rights in it. John Bunyan would dispute any such pretensions. 'At another time,' says Bunyan, 'I was much under this question. Whether the blood of Christ was sufficient to save my soul? in which doubt I continued from morning till about seven or eight at night : and at last, when I was, as it were, quite worn out with fear, lest it should not lay hold on me, these words did sound suddenly within my heart : "He is able." But methought, this word "able" was spoke loud unto me; it showed a great word, it seemed to be writ in great letters, and gave such a jostle to my fear and doubt as I never had before or after. For "He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him." '

`Is there salvation for me, even for me?' asks J. B. Gough, in his despair.

`Is the blood of Christ sufficient to save my soul, even mine?' asks John Bunyan, in that anxious hour.

And to both of them there came the same reply : `He is able to save to the uttermost!'

`It is a great word!' says Gough.

`It seems to be writ in great letters !' says Bunyan.

And by that gallant and assuring word they were both greatly delivered.

III

In the fairy story that beguiled our infancy, the Three Giants confronted the hero just as he was setting out on his romantic quest. J. B. Gough had a precisely similar experience. On the very threshold of the new life three tyrannical figures arose and endeavoured to drive him back to slavery. Their names ? The name of the first was Yesterday; the name of the second was To-day; and the name of the third was To-morrow.

Giant Yesterday pointed out with terrific emphasis that the past is absolutely indelible. What's done can never be undone! There are some things that even God cannot do ; and this is one of them.

Wounds of the soul, though healed, will ache;

The reddening scars remain
And make confession;
Lost innocence returns no more;
We are not what we were
Before transgression!

To the end of his days, Gough was haunted by the grim ghosts of those seven terrible and remorseless years. 'I have suffered,' he cried, 'and come out of the fire scorched and scathed with the marks upon my person and with the memory of it burnt right into my soul He likened his life to a snowdrift that had been sadly stained. No power on earth can restore its former purity and whiteness. 'The scars remain ! the scars remain !' he used to say, with bitter self-reproaches. Giant Yesterday pointed to the black, black past derisively ; held it as a threat over the poor penitent's bowed and contrite head ; and told him in tones that sounded like thunder-claps that there was no escape.

Giant To-day points to things as they are : 'Look at yourself !' the tyrant exclaims. 'Facts are facts ; your present condition is a fact ; how can you evade it ?' Gough throws himself back in a chair and gives rein to his fancy. A vision, or, rather, a series of visions, come to him. Before him stands a bright, fair-haired, blue-eyed, beautiful boy, with rosy cheeks and pearly teeth and ruby lip—the perfect picture of innocence and peace, health, purity and joy.

`Who are you?' Gough asked.

`I am your Past ; I am what you Were!'

Another figure appears. The youth has become a man. He looks born to command. Intellect flashes from the eye; the noble brow speaks of genius trained and consecrated ; it is a glorious spectacle.

`And who are you!' Gough asks again.

`I am your Ideal ; I am what you Might Have Been!' Then there creeps slowly into the bare room a wretched thing, unkempt and loathsome, it is manacled, hard and fast; the face is furrowed and filthy; the lip is swollen and repulsive ; the brow is branded as the throne of sensuality; the eyes glare wildly and are bleared and dim.

`And who are you?' Gough again demands.

`I am your Present; I am what you Are!' By this expressive shadow-show, Giant To-day sought to frighten a trembling spirit from its rich inheritance.

And as for Giant To-morrow, his case is ready-made. 'It is easy enough to be religious to-day,' he says, 'but what of to-morrow, and the next day, and all the days that are coming? If one temptation fails to overthrow you, another will surely bring you down !' And Gough, who knows the cruel strength of each temptation, feels the force of what these monsters say.

IV

The Three Giants withdraw, leaving Gough in the depths of despair. How can he venture upon the Christian life? He has only to review his own indelible Past; he has only to contemplate his humiliating Present; he has only to conjure up the sinister probabilities of the unpromising Future, in order to recognise the sheer audacity of such a step. Can he reasonably hope to keep his vow through all the years ahead? Many a race is lost at the last lap ; many a ship is wrecked on the reefs outside its final port; many a battle is lost on the last charge; what hope has he of completing the course upon which he proposes to venture ? He feels that it is hopelessly beyond him.

And it is at this critical juncture that the text comes bravely to his rescue.

'I am not able!' moans the distracted penitent. 'He is able!' replies the text.

'I should falter before I had finished !' says Gough.

'He is able to save to the uttermost,' answers the text. To the uttermost—to the very last inch of the very last yard of the very last mile ! To the uttermost—to the very last minute of the very last hour of the very last day! 'He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them.'

And thus the Three Giants are discomfited and put to confusion. And Gough enters into a peace that only becomes deeper and fuller and richer and sweeter as the long and busy years go by.

V

Every man carries in his soul a note of exclamation and a note of interrogation. But we do not place them similarly. The leper in the Gospels put the note of exclamation against the ability of Christ to cleanse him, and the note of interrogation against His willingness to save. 'If Thou wilt, Thou canst make me whole!'

Thou canst!!!

If Thou wilt ff f

Most of us find the prevailing wind blowing from the opposite quarter. We give the Saviour credit for a certain amiable willingness to help us ; but, knowing as we do all that the Three Giants have to say, we doubt His ability to deliver. We put the notes of exclamation and of interrogation the other way.

Thou wilt!!!

If Thou canstf f

But, as J. B. Gough discovered on that never-to-be-forgotten day, the Christian message is a revelation of a limitless ability to deliver. It is never a try; it is always a triumph. We have witnessed this desperate struggle in a squalid room at Massachusetts—the struggle of an enslaved soul after freedom. Let us go back a hundred years. Exactly a century before this scene was enacted in an American attic, a dramatic episode marked the historic ministry of Philip Doddridge at Northampton. An Irishman named Connell was convicted of a capital offence and sentenced to be publicly hanged. Mr. Doddridge, at great trouble and expense, instituted a most rigid scrutiny, and proved, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that Connell was a hundred and twenty miles away when the crime was committed. The course of judgement could not, however, be deflected. Connell was asked if he had any request to make before setting out for the gallows. He answered that he desired the procession to pause in front of the house of Mr. Philip Doddridge, that he might kneel on the minister's doorstep and pray for the man who had tried to save him.

'Mr. Doddridge,' he cried, when the procession halted, 'every hair of my head thanks you; every throb of my heart thanks you ; every drop of my blood thanks you; for you did your best to save me !'

Mr. Doddridge was willing to save.

Mr. Doddridge did his best to save.

Mr. Doddridge was not able to save.

But 'He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him.' That is the glory of the Gospel that won the heart of Gough that day and held him a glad captive through all the fruitful years that followed.

VI

Mr. Chesterton says that 'God paints in many colours, but He never paints so gorgeously as when He paints in white.' The crimson of the sunset; the azure of the ocean; the green of the valleys ; the scarlet of the poppies; the silver of the dewdrops; the gold of the gorse; these are exquisite—so perfectly beautiful, indeed, that we cannot imagine an attractive heaven without them. God paints in many colours; but in the soul of J. B. Gough He paints in white; and we feel that here the divine art is at its very best. Forty-four crowded and productive years have passed since that grim struggle in the squalid room. Gough is again in America, addressing a vast audience of young men at Philadelphia.

`Young men,' he cries, perhaps with a bitter memory of those seven indelible years, 'Young men, keep your record clean !'

He pauses : it is a longer pause than usual ; and the audience wonders. But he regains his voice.

`Young men,' he repeats more feebly this time, `keep your record clean !'

Another pause, longer than before. But again he finds the power of speech.

`Young men,' he cries a third time, but in a thin, wavering voice, 'young men, keep your record clean !'

He falls heavily on the platform. Devout men carry him to his burial, and make lamentation over him. His race is finished ; his voyage completed ; his battle won. The promise has been literally and triumphantly fulfilled. The grace that saved him has kept him to the very last inch of the very last yard of the very last mile ; to the very last minute of the very last hour of the very last day ; for 'He is able to save to the uttermost them that come unto God by Him !'

XI - JOHN KNOX'S TEXT

SOME men are not born to die. It is their prerogative to live; they come on purpose. A thousand deaths will not lay them in a grave. No disease from within, no danger from without, can by any means destroy them. They bear upon their faces the stamp of the immortal. In more senses than one, they come into the world for good. Among such deathless men John Knox stands out conspicuously. When in Edinburgh it is impossible to believe that John Knox lived four hundred years ago. He is so very much alive to-day that it seems incredible that he was living even then. The people will show you his grave in the middle of the road, and the meager epitaph on the flat tombstone will do its feeble best to convince you that his voice has been silent for centuries ; but you will skeptically shake your head and move away. For, as you walk about the noble and romantic city, John Knox is everywhere! He is the most ubiquitous man you meet. You come upon him at every street corner. Here is the house in which he dwelt; there is the church in which he preached ; at every turn you come upon places that are haunted by him still. The very stones vibrate with the strident accents of his voice; the walls echo to his footsteps. I was introduced to quite a number of people in Edinburgh; but I blush to confess that I have forgotten them all—all but John Knox. It really seems to me, looking back upon that visit, that I met John Knox somewhere or other every five minutes. I could hear the ring of his voice; I could see the flash of his eye; I could feel the impress of his huge and commanding personality. The tomb in the middle of the road notwithstanding, John Knox is indisputably the most virile force in Scotland at this hour. I dare say that, like me, he sometimes catches sight of that tomb in the middle of the road. If so, he laughs—as he could laugh—and strides defiantly on. For John Knox was born in 1505 and, behold, he liveth and abideth forever !

II

John Knox, I say, was born in 1505. In 1505, therefore, Scotland was born again. For the birth of such a man is the regeneration of a nation. Life in Knox was not only immortal ; it was contagious. Because of Knox, Carlyle affirms, the people began to live! 'In the history of Scotland,' says Carlyle, himself a Scotsman, 'in the history of Scotland I can find but one epoch : it contains nothing of world-interest at all, but this Reformation by Knox.' But surely, surely, the sage is nodding! Has Carlyle forgotten Sir Walter Scott and Robert Burns and all Scotland's noble contribution to literature, to industry, to religion and to life? But Carlyle will not retract or modify a single word. 'This that Knox did for his nation,' he goes on, 'was a resurrection as from death. The people began to live ! Scotch literature and thought, Scotch industry; James Watt, David Hume, Walter Scott, Robert Burns : I find John Knox acting in the heart's core of every one of these persons and phenomena; I find that without him they would not have been.' So much have I said in order to show that, beyond the shadow of a doubt, if a text made John Knox, then that text made history.

III

`Go !' said the old reformer to his wife, as he lay a-dying, and the words were his last, `go, read where I cast my first anchor !' She needed no more explicit instructions, for he had told her the story again and again. It is Richard Bannatyne, Knox's serving-man, who has placed the scene on record. `On November 24, 1572,' he says, 'John Knox departed this life to his eternal rest. Early in the afternoon he said, "Now, for the last time, I commend my spirit, soul and body"—pointing upon his three fingers—"into Thy hands, O Lord !" Thereafter, about five o'clock, he said to his wife, "Go, read where I cast my first anchor !" She did not need to be told, and so she read the seventeenth of John's evangel.' Let us listen as she reads it ! 'Thou hast given Him authority over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him, and this is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent.' (John 17:2,3)

Here was a strange and striking contrast!

'Eternal Life! Life Eternal!' says the Book.

Now listen to the laboured breathing from the bed!

The Bed speaks of Death; the Book speaks of Life Everlasting!

'Life!' the dying man starts as the great cadences fall upon his ear.

'This is Life Eternal, that they might know Thee!' 'Life Eternal!'

'It was there,' he declares with his last breath, 'it was there that I cast my first anchor!'

IV

How was that first anchor cast? I have tried to piece the records together. Paul never forgot the day on which he saw Stephen stoned; John Knox never forgot the day on which he saw George Wishart burned. Wishart was a man 'of such grace'—so Knox himself tells us—'as before him was never heard within this realm.' He was regarded with an awe that was next door to superstition, and with an affection that was almost adoration. Are we not told that in the days when the plague lay over Scotland, 'the people of Dundee saw it approaching from the west in the form of a great black cloud?'

They fell on their knees and prayed, crying to the cloud to pass them by, but even while they prayed it came nearer. Then they looked around for the most holy man among them, to intervene with God on their behalf. All eyes turned to George Wishart, and he stood up, stretching his arms to the cloud, and prayed, and it rolled back.' Out on the borders of the town, however, the pestilence was raging, and Wishart, hastening thither, took up his station on the town wall, preaching to the plague-stricken on the one side of him and to the healthy on the other, and exhibiting such courage and intrepidity in grappling with the awful scourge that he became the idol of the grateful people. In 1546, however, he was convicted of heresy and burned at the foot of the Castle Wynd, opposite the Castle Gate. When he came near to the fire, Knox tells us, he sat down upon his knees, and repeated aloud some of the most touching petitions from the Psalms. As a sign of forgiveness, he kissed the executioner on the cheek, saying: 'Lo, here is a token that I forgive thee. My harte, do thine office!' The faggots were kindled, and the leaping flames bore the soul of Wishart triumphantly skywards.

V

And there, a few yards off, stands Knox ! Have a good look at him! He is a man 'rather under middle height, with broad shoulders, swarthy face, black hair, and a beard of the same color a span and a half long. He has heavy eyebrows, eyes deeply sunk, cheekbones prominent and cheeks ruddy. The mouth is large, the lips full, especially the upper one. The whole aspect of the man is not unpleasing; and, in moments of emotion, it is invested with an air of dignity and majesty.' Knox could never shake from his sensitive mind the tragic yet triumphant scene near the Castle Gate; and when, many years afterwards, he himself turned aside to die, he repeated with closed eyes the prayers that he had heard George Wishart offer under the shadow of the stake.

Was it then, I wonder, that John Knox turned sadly homeward and read to himself the great High Priestly prayer in 'the seventeenth of John's evangel' ? Was it on that memorable night that he caught a glimpse of the place which all the redeemed hold in the heart of the Redeemer ? Was it on that melancholy evening that there broke upon him the revelation of a love that enfolded not only his martyred friend and himself, but the faithful of every time and of every clime ? Was it then that he opened his heart to the magic and the music of those tremendous words : 'Thou hast given Him authority over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as Thou hast given Him; and this is life eternal, that they might know Thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent.' Was it then? I cannot say for certain. I only know that we never meet with Knox in Scottish story until after the martyrdom of Wishart; and I know that, by the events of that sad and tragic day, all his soul was stirred within him. But, although I do not know for certain that the anchor was first cast then, I know that it was first cast there. 'Go!' he said, with the huskiness of death upon his speech, 'read me where I cast my first anchor!' And his wife straightway read to him the stately sentences I have just re-written.

`Life Eternal!'

`This is Life Eternal!'

`This is Life Eternal, that they might know Thee!' `It was there, there, THERE, that I cast my first anchor !'

VI

Fierce as were the storms that beat upon Knox during the great historic years that followed, that anchor bravely held. To say nothing of his experiences at Court and the powerful efforts to coax or to cow him into submission, think of those twelve years of exile, eighteen months of which were spent on the French galleys. We catch two furtive glimpses of him. The galley in which he is chained makes a cruise round the Scottish coast. It passes so near to the fair fields of Fife that Knox can distinctly see the spires of St. Andrew's. At the moment, Knox was so ill that his life was despaired of ; and the taunting vision might well have broken his spirit altogether. But the anchor held; the anchor held ! 'AM' exclaimed Knox, raising himself on his elbow, 'I see the steeple of that place where God first in public opened my mouth to His glory ; and I am fully persuaded, how weak soever I now appear, that I shall not depart this life till that my tongue shall glorify His godly name in the same place.' Again, as Carlyle tells, 'a priest one day presented to the galley-slaves an image of the Virgin Mother, requiring that they, the blasphemous heretics, should do it reverence. "Mother ? Mother of God ?" said Knox, when the turn came to him, "This is no Mother of God ; this is a piece of painted wood She is better for swimming, I think, than for being worshipped !" and he flung the thing into the river.' Knox had cast his anchor in the seventeenth of John's evangel.

`This is life eternal, that they might know Thee!'

And since he had himself found life eternal in the personal friendship of a Personal Redeemer, it was intolerable to him that others should gaze with superstitious eyes on 'a bit of painted wood.'

The thing fell into the river with a splash. It was a rude jest, but an expressive one. All the Reformation was summed up in it. Eternal life was not to be found in such things. 'This is life eternal, that they might know Thee.' That, says Knox, is where I cast my first anchor ; and, through all the storm and stress of those baffling and eventful years, that anchor held !

VII

Nor was there any parting of the cable or dragging of the anchor at the last. Richard Bannatyne, sitting beside his honoured master's deathbed, heard a long, long sigh. A singular fancy overtook him.

`Now, sir,' he said, 'the time to end your battle has come. Remember those comfortable promises of our Saviour Jesus Christ which you have so often shown to us. And it may be that, when your eyes are blind and your ears deaf to every other sight and sound, you will still be able to recognise my voice. I shall bend over you and ask if you have still the hope of glory. Will you promise that, if you are able to give me some signal, you will do so?'

The sick man promised, and, soon after, this is what happened :

Grim in his deep death-anguish the stern old champion lay, And the locks upon his pillow were floating thin and grey, And, visionless and voiceless, with quick and labouring breath, He waited for his exit through life's dark portal, Death.

`Nast thou the hope of glory?' They bowed to catch the thrill

That through some languid token might be responsive still, Nor watched they long nor waited for some obscure reply, He raised a clay-cold finger, and pointed to the sky.

So the death-angel found him, what time his bow he bent, To give the struggling spirit a sweet enfranchisement.

So the death-angel left him, what time earth's bonds were riven,

The cold, stark, stiffening finger still pointing up to heaven.

`He had a sore fight of an existence,' says Carlyle, `wrestling with Popes and Principalities; in defeat, contention, life-long struggle; rowing as a galley-slave, wandering as an exile. A sore fight : but he won it! "Have you hope?" they asked him in his last moment, when he could no longer speak. He lifted his finger, pointed upward, and so died! Honour to him ! His works have not died. The letter of his work dies, as of all men's ; but the spirit of it, never.' Did I not say in my opening sentences that John Knox was among the immortal humans ? When he entered the world, he came into it for good !

VIII

`This is life eternal, that they might know Thee!' `That,' says Knox, with his dying breath, 'that is where I cast my first anchor !' It is a sure anchorage, O heart of mine! Cast thine anchor there ! Cast thine anchor in the oaths and covenants of the Most High! Cast thine anchor in His infallible, immutable, unbreakable Word ! Cast thine anchor in the infinite love of God! Cast thine anchor in the redeeming grace of Christ! Cast thine anchor in the everlasting Gospel! Cast thine anchor in the individual concern of the individual Saviour for the individual soul! Cast thine anchor there; and, come what may, that anchor will always hold!

VI

I am glad that that 'other book' that John saw opened was the Book of Life. Westminster Abbey enshrines the names of the illustrious dead: that other book—the last and the best that John saw opened—contains only the names of those who are alive—and alive for evermore. 'I am come that ye might have life,' said Jesus, in one of His historic manifestoes, 'I am come that ye might have life, and that ye might have it more abundantly.' For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life.' The Saviour is the Fountain of Life; the Gospel is a Message of Life; the Volume that John saw opened in heaven was the Book of Life. There is infinite comfort in that.

I am glad, too, that it is the Lamb's book. My heart would fail me if that awful volume had been inscribed by any hand but His. Lachlan Campbell was a good man; he was the strictest and the sternest of the elders of Drumtochty ; and he loved Flora, his erring daughter, dearly. But he was over-hasty in striking her name out of the family Bible. We all remember the rebuke that Marget Howe administered to him, when she saw the book, its ink all blurred by tears.

`This is what ye hey dune,' she cried, 'and ye let a woman see yir wark. Ye are an auld man, and in sore travail, but a' tell ye before God, ye hae the greater shame. Juist twenty years o' age this spring, and her mither dead. Nae woman to watch over her, and she wandered frae the fold, and a' ye can dae is to take her oot o' yir Bible! Wae's me if oor Father had blotted oor names frae the Book o' Life when we left His hoose. But He sent His ain Son to seek us, an' a weary road He cam. Puir Flora, tae hae sic a father !'

Thanks to Marget's gracious intervention, Flora came home again ; she was welcomed with endless tears and caresses; the Gaelic —'the best of all languages for loving'—contains fifty words for darling, and Lachlan used them all that night! The name had to be re-entered in the Bible, and I..c.hlan had to ask Flora's forgiveness for erasing it. I am glad that the book on which my eternal destiny depends is the Lamb's Book—the Lamb's Book of Life!

VII

Thackeray tells us that when good old Colonel Newcome—the greatest gentleman in literature—lay dying, the watchers noticed that his mind was moving backwards across the pageant of the years. He is in India addressing his regiment on parade ! He is in Paris, living through the days of auld lang syne! And then! 'At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time. And, just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said "Adsum!" and fell back. It was the word we used at school, when names were called; and lo, he whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of The Master !'

The Book!

The Lamb's Book!

The Lamb's Book of Life!

When that last volume is opened, and that last roll called, may I, like Colonel Newcome, be ready to answer gladly to my name!

XVI - WILLIAM CAREY'S TEXT

THE westering sun, slanting through the tops of the taller trees, is beginning to throw long shadows across the green and gently-undulating fields. The brindled cattle, lying at their ease and meditatively chewing the cud in these quiet Northamptonshire pastures, are disturbed by the sound of footsteps in the lane. Some of them rise in protest and stare fixedly at the quaint figure that has broken so rudely on their afternoon reverie. But he causes them no alarm, for they have often seen him pass this way before. He is the village cobbler. This very morning he tramped along his winding thoroughfare on his way to Northampton. He was carrying his wallet of shoes—a fortnight's work—to the Government contractor there. And now he is trudging his way back to Moulton with the roll of leather that will keep him busy for another week or two. The cattle stare at him, as well they may. The whole world would stare at him if it had the chance to-day. For this is William Carey, the harbinger of a new order, the prophet of a new age, the maker of a new world ! The cattle stare at him, but he has no eyes for them. His thoughts are over the seas and far away. He is a dreamer; but he is a dreamer who means business. Less than twenty years ago, in a tall chestnut tree not far from this very lane, he spied a bird's nest that he greatly coveted. He climbed—and fell! He climbed again—and fell again! He climbed a third time, and, in the third fall, broke his leg. A few weeks later, whilst the limb was still bandaged, his mother left him for an hour or two, instructing him to take the greatest care of himself in her absence. When she returned, he was sitting in his chair, flushed and excited, with the bird's nest on his knees.

`Hurrah, mother; I've done it at last! Here it is, look!'

`You don't mean to tell me you've climbed that tree again!'

`I couldn't help it, mother; I couldn't, really! If I begin a thing I must go through with it!'

On monuments erected in honor of William Carey, on busts and plaques and pedestals, on the title pages of his innumerable biographies, and under pictures that have been painted of him, I have often seen inscribed some stirring sentence that fell from his eloquent lips. But I have never seen that one. Yet the most characteristic word that Carey ever uttered was the reply that he made to his mother that day!

`If I begin a thing I must go through with it!'

If you look closely, you will see that sentence stamped upon his countenance as, with a far-away look in his eye, he passes down the lane. Let us follow him, and we shall find that he is beginning some tremendous things ; and, depend upon it, he will at any cost go through with them !

II

It is not an elaborately-furnished abode, this little home of his. For, although he is minister, school, master and cobbler, the three vocations only provide him with about thirty-six pounds a year. Looking around, I can see but a few stools, his cobbler's outfit, a book or two (including a Bible, a copy of Captain Cook's Voyages and a Dutch Grammar) besides a queer-looking map on the wall. We must have a good look at this map, for there is history in it as well as geography. It is a map of the world, made of leather and brown paper, and it is the work of his own fingers. Look, I say, at this map, for it is a reflection of the soul of Carey. As he came up the lane, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, he was thinking of the world. He is a jack-of-all-trades, yet he is a man of a single thought. 'Perhaps,' he says to himself, 'perhaps God means what He says !' The world ! The world ! The World! God so loved the world! Go ye into all the world! The kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ ! It is always the world, the world, the world. That thought haunted the mind of Carey night and day. The map of the world hung in his room, but it only hung in his room because it already hung in his heart. He thought of it, he dreamed of it, he preached of it. And he was amazed that, when he unburdened his soul to his brother-ministers, or preached on that burning theme to his little congregation, they listened with respectful interest and close attention, yet did nothing. At length, on May 31, 1792, Carey preached his great sermon, the sermon that gave rise to our modern missionary movement, the sermon that made history. It was at Nottingham. 'Lengthen thy cords'—so ran the text—'lengthen thy cords and strengthen thy stakes, for thou shalt break forth on the right hand and on the left; and thy seed shall inherit the Gentiles and make the desolate cities to be inhabited.'

'Lengthen thy cords!' said the text.

'Strengthen thy stakes!' said the text. (Isaiah 54:2)

'Expect great things from God!' said the preacher.

'Attempt great things for God!' said the preacher.

'If all the people had lifted up their voices and wept,' says Dr. Ryland, 'as the children of Israel did at Bochim, I should not have wondered at the effect ; it would only have seemed proportionate to the cause; so clearly did Mr. Carey prove the criminality of our supineness in the cause of God !' But the people did not weep! They did not even wait! They rose to leave as usual. When Carey, stepping down from the pulpit, saw the people quietly dispersing, he seized Andrew Fuller's hand and wrung it in an agony of distress. 'Are we not going to do anything!' he demanded. 'Oh, Fuller, call them back, call them back! We dare not separate without doing anything!' As a result of that passionate entreaty, a missionary society was formed, and William Carey offered himself as the Society's first missionary.

'If I begin a thing I must go through with it!' he said, as a schoolboy.

'We dare not separate without doing something!' he cried, as a young minister.

'Lengthen the cords! Strengthen the stakes!' 'Expect great things! Attempt great things!'

III

I can never think of William Carey without thinking of Jane Conquest. In the little hamlet by the sea, poor Jane watched through the night beside the cot of her dying child. Then, suddenly, a light leapt in at the lattice, crimsoning every object in the room. It was a ship on fire, and no eyes but hers had seen it ! Leaving her dying boy to the great Father's care, she trudged through the snow to the old church on the hill.

She crept through the narrow window and climbed the belfry stair,
And grasped the rope, sole cord of hope for the mariners in despair.
And the wild wind helped her bravely, and she wrought with an earnest will,
And the clamorous bell spake out right well to the hamlet under the hill.

And it roused the slumbering fishers, nor its warning task gave o'er
Till a hundred fleet and eager feet were hurrying to the shore ;
And the lifeboat midst the breakers, with a brave and gallant few,
O'ercame each check and reached the wreck and saved the hapless crew.

Upon the sensitive soul of William Carey there broke the startling vision of a world in peril, and he could find no sleep for his eyes nor slumber for his eyelids until the whole church was up and doing for the salvation of the perishing millions. It has been finely said that when, towards the close of the eighteenth century, it pleased God to awaken from her slumbers a drowsy and lethargic church, there rang out, from the belfry of the ages, a clamorous and insistent alarm ; and, in that arousing hour, the hand upon the bellrope was the hand of William Carey.

'We dare not separate without doing something!' 'Lengthen the cords! Strengthen the stakes!' 'Expect great things! Attempt great things.' 'Here am I; send me, send me!'

IV

Now the life of William Carey is both the outcome and the exemplification of a stupendous principle. That principle was never better stated than by the prophet from whose flaming lips Carey borrowed his text. 'Thine eyes,' said Isaiah, 'Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty: they shall behold the land that stretches very far off.' The vision kingly stands related to the vision continental; the revelation of the Lord leads to the revelation of the limitless landscape. What was it that happened one memorable day upon the road to Damascus? It was simply this : Saul of Tarsus saw the King in His beauty! And what happened as a natural and inevitable consequence? There came into his life the passion of the far horizon. All the narrowing limits of Jewish prejudice and the cramping bonds of Pharisaic superstition fell from him like the scales that seemed to drop from his eyes. The world is at his feet. Single-handed and alone, taking his life in his hand, he storms the great centres of civilisation, the capitals of proud empires, in the name of Jesus Christ. No difficulty can daunt him; no danger impede his splendid progress. He passes from sea to sea, from island to island, from continent to continent. The hunger of the earth is in his soul; there is no coast or colony to which he will not go. He feels himself a debtor to Greek and to barbarian, to bond and to free. He climbs mountains, fords rivers, crosses continents, bears stripes, endures imprisonments, suffers shipwreck, courts insult, and dares a thousand deaths out of the passion of his heart to carry the message of hope to every crevice and corner of the earth. A more thrilling story of hazard, hardship, heroism and adventure has never been written. On the road to Damascus Paul saw the King in His beauty, and he spent the remainder of his life in exploiting the limitless landscape that unrolled itself before him. The vision of the King opened to his eyes the vision of the continents. In every age these two visions have always gone side by side. In the fourteenth century, the vision of the King broke upon the soul of John Wickliffe. Instantly, there arose the Lollards, scouring city, town and hamlet with the new evangel, the representatives of the instinct of the far horizon. The fifteenth century contains two tremendous names. As soon as the world received the vision kingly by means of Savonarola, it received the vision continental by means of Christopher Columbus. In the sixteenth century, the same principle holds. It is, on the one hand, the century of Martin Luther, and, on the other, the century of Raleigh, Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Grenville and the great Elizabethan navigators. All the oceans of the world became a snowstorm of white sails. The seventeenth century gave us, first the Puritans, and then the sailing of the Mayflower. So we came to the eighteenth century. And the eighteenth century is essentially the century of John Wesley and of William Carey. At Aldersgate Street the vision of the King in His beauty dawned graciously upon the soul of John Wesley. During the fifty years that followed, that vision fell, through Wesley's instrumentality, upon the entire English people. The Methodist revival of the eighteenth century is one of the most gladsome records in the history of Europe. And then, John Wesley having impressed upon all men the vision of the King, William Carey arose to impress upon them the vision of the Continents.

'We must do something!' he cried.

'Lengthen the cords! Strengthen the stakes!' 'Expect great things! Attempt great things!' 'The King! The King! The Continents! The Continents!'

V

Having gazed upon these things, our eyes are the better fitted to appreciate the significance of the contents of the cobbler's room. There he sits at his last, the Bible from which he drew his text spread out before him, and a home-made map of the world upon the wall ! There is no element of chance about that artless record. There is a subtle and inevitable connection between the two. In the Bible he saw the King in His beauty: on the map he caught glimpses of the far horizon. To him, the two were inseparable ; and, moved by the Vision of the Lord which he caught in the one, and by the Vision of the limitless landscape which he caught in the other, he left his last and made history.

VI

'Lengthen the cords! Strengthen the stakes!' 'Expect great things! Attempt great things!' 'Do something! Do something!'

It was at Nottingham that Carey preached that arousing sermon : it was in India that he practised it. With the eye of a statesman and of a strategist he saw that the best way of regaining the ground that was being lost in Europe was to achieve new conquests in Asia. History abounds in striking coincidences; but, among them all, there is none more suggestive than the fact that it was on November 11, 1793—the very day on which the French revolutionists tore the Cross from Notre Dame, smashed it on the streets, and abjured Christianity —that William Carey sailed up the Hooghly, landed at Calcutta, and claimed a new continent for Christ ! And, like a statesman and a strategist, he settled down to do in India the work to which he had challenged the church at home.

'Lengthen the cords!'

'Strengthen the stakes!'

He started an indigo factory; made himself the master of a dozen languages ; became Professor of Bengali, Sanskrit and Mahratta at a salary of fifteen hundred a year; all in order to engage more and still more missionaries and to multiply the activities by which the Kingdom of Christ might be set up in India. His work of translation was a marvel in itself.

`If I begin a thing I must go through with it!' he said that day with the birds'-nest resting on his lap.

`Do something! Do something!' he said in his agony as he saw the people dispersing after his sermon.

And in India he did things. He toiled terribly. But he sent the gospel broadcast through the lengths and breadths of that vast land; built up the finest college in the Indian Empire ; and gave the peoples the Word of God in their own tongue.

VII

Just before Carey died, Alexander Duff arrived in India. He was a young Highlander of four-and-twenty, tall and handsome, with flashing eye and quivering voice. Before setting out on his own life-work he went to see the man who had changed the face of the world. He reached the college on a sweltering day in July. 'There he beheld a little yellow old man in a white jacket, who tottered up to the visitor, received his greetings, and with outstretched hands, solemnly blessed him.' Each fell in love with the other. Carey, standing on the brink of the grave, rejoiced to see the handsome and cultured young Scotsman dedicating his life to the evangelisation and emancipation of India. Duff felt that the old man's benediction would cling to his work like a fragrance through all the great and epoch-making days ahead.

Not long after Carey lay a-dying, and, to his great delight, Duff came to see him. The young Highlander told the veteran of his admiration and his love. In a whisper that was scarcely audible, the dying man begged his visitor to pray with him. After he had complied, and taken a sad farewell of the frail old man, he turned to go. On reaching the door he fancied that he heard his name. He turned and saw that Mr. Carey was beckoning him.

`Mr. Duff,' said the dying man, his earnestness imparting a new vigour to his voice, 'Mr. Duff, you have been speaking about Dr. Carey, Dr. Carey, Dr. Carey! When I am gone, say nothing about Dr. Carey—speak only of Dr. Carey's Saviour.'

Did I say that, when our little cobbler startled the cattle in the Northamptonshire lane, he was thinking only of the world, the world, the world? I was wrong! He was thinking primarily of the Saviour, the Saviour, the Saviour—the Saviour of the World!

And yet I was right; for the two visions are one vision, the two thoughts one thought.

The King, the King, the King!

The Continents, the Continents, the Continents! The Saviour, the Saviour, the Saviour!

The World, the World, the World!

As a lad, Carey caught the vision of the King in His beauty; and, as an inevitable consequence, he spent his life in the conquest of the land that is very far off.

XVII - JAMES HANNINGTON'S TEXT

HE is a proud young English gentleman—wealthy, cultured, athletic; and the words smite him like a blow in the face.

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

Those who know him best would say that he is fit for anything; yet these are the stinging words that confront him in the crisis of his young career.

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!' (Luke 9:32)

He is the kind of fellow upon whom you would bestow a second glance if it were your good fortune to meet him on the street. He is tall, lithe, handsome, and splendidly proportioned. He strikes you as having every nerve and sinew under perfect control. His face is vigorous and arresting. Without seeming in the least degree self-assertive or pugnacious, it suggests boundless energy and dauntless resolution. His eyes are grey and full of mischief. His voice is resonant, impressive, commanding. His laugh is boisterous, contagious, unforgettable. Although still young, he has travelled widely; has visited the famous cities of the continent; and, in his own yacht, has navigated the waterways of Europe. He is just finishing his university career at Oxford. Come with me to his room at St. Mary's Hall ; and, as you glance around its walls, the medley of objects that will meet the eye will furnish us with some index to his character. In the centre of everything is a portrait of his mother, a stately and beautiful lady, from whom he has inherited many of his noblest traits. Arranged around it are the bones of many curious monsters, and the crude but cunning weapons of barbarous peoples. In the corner stands a miscellaneous collection of riding-whips ; whilst here, under the window, stands a tank, in which numbers of live fish disport themselves. For our gay young undergraduate is a naturalist ; the woods and the waters have taken him into their confidence and have freely yielded up their secrets.

Here he is, then, standing on the threshold of destiny ! He appears to be one of fortune's darlings. All that exceptional gifts, careful training, extensive travel, and the highest education can do for a man has been done for him. And yet, as he prepares to turn all these priceless advantages to some account, and to set his face seriously towards his lifework, these are the words that smite him in the face and stab him to the quick !

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

Like the rich young ruler whom he so strikingly resembles, he turns away sorrowful. The gaiety of his spirit is clouded in gloom. 'Not fit for the Kingdom of God!' What is it that, with all his charms and his accomplishments, he still lacks?

II

It is on the eve of his ordination that these cruel words rebuke him. For, in striving to equip himself for the useful life that he so earnestly desires, he has by no means forgotten the loftiest claims of all. The fear of God is constantly before his eyes. With all his fun and frolic, his passion for sport and his thirst for adventure, James Hannington is in reality a fervently religious youth. At the back of his mind he is revolving some tremendous problems. Let me copy a couple of entries from his private journal. The one was written in his eighteenth year; the other in his twentieth.

'March 20, 1868: I have been much tempted of late to turn Roman Catholic, and nearly did so, but my faith has been much shaken by reading Cardinal Manning's Funeral Sermon for Cardinal Wiseman, over whose death I mourned much. He said that Cardinal Wiseman's last words were : "Let me have all that the Church can do for me !" I seemed to see at once that if the highest ecclesiastic stood thus in need of external rites on his death-bed, the system must be rotten, and I gave up all idea of departing from our Protestant faith.'

From this significant entry, with its revelation of great thoughts stirring in his soul, I turn to one of a very different kind, yet of no less value.

'February 9, 1867: I lost my ring out shooting, with scarcely a hope of ever seeing it again. I offered to give the gamekeeper ten shillings if he found it, and was led to ask God that the ring might be found and be to me a sure sign of salvation. From that moment the ring seemed on my finger, and I was not surprised when Sayers brought it to me on Monday evening. He had picked it up in the long grass in cover, a most unlikely place ever to find it. A miracle! Jesus, by Thee alone can we obtain remission of our sins!'

The diary contains a footnote to this entry, written by Hannington some years afterwards. 'This,' he says, 'was written by me at the most worldly period of my existence.' Yet there it is! These entries prove that, however far from the Kingdom Hannington may then have been, he kept his face turned wistfully and steadfastly towards its gates. The deep religious impulses throbbing in his soul moved him to associate himself with the church; to receive upon his lips the awful mysteries of the Christian sacrament; and, later on, to apply for ordination. But, as he drew nearer to that solemn and searching ceremony, his conscience cried out and his heart failed him.

'How I dread my ordination !' he writes. 'I would willingly draw back ; but, when I am tempted to do so, I hear ringing in my ears : "No man, having put his hand to the plough and looking back is fit for the Kingdom of God." What am I to do? What ?'

What, indeed? He felt that he was 'not fit for the Kingdom of God,' and dare not go on! And yet, if he turned back, he was only giving fuller evidence of his unfitness! Here was a dilemma! He resolved at length to go on, and, in going on, to seek with full purpose of heart that fitness that he felt he lacked. 'It is characteristic of the man,' says his biographer, 'that he should have faced what he now dreaded with an almost morbid fear. His conscience would have absolved him on no other terms. "No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God." Those words held him fast to his purpose!' So he made his decision. But the decision did not relieve his deep spiritual embarrassment, for, whilst he felt that he dared not look back, he felt that he was unfit to go on.

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

The words beat themselves into his brain. It was a terrible situation and he saw no way of escape.

III

The way of escape came by post. It sometimes does. There are a few choice spirits in God's world who have mastered the high art of conducting a religious correspondence. They can write without gush and without gloom : their letters are neither sentimental nor sanctimonious. His old comrade and chum, the Rev. E. C. Dawson, M.A., who afterwards became his biographer, was, about this time, greatly concerned on Hannington's behalf. 'I could not tell why,' he says, 'but the burden seemed to press upon me more heavily day by day.' At last he resolved to write. He knew Hannington's scorn of cant, and feared that such a letter would offend him. 'Still,' he says, 'I reasoned that, if friendship was to be lost, it should be at least well lost. So I wrote a simple, unvarnished account of my own spiritual experience. I tried to explain how it was that I was not now as formerly. I spoke of the power of the love of Christ to transform the life of a man and to draw out all its latent possibilities; and, finally, I urged him, as he loved his own soul, to make a definite surrender of himself to the Saviour of the world.' And the result? For the result we must turn to the diary :

'July 15: Dawson, who is now a curate in Surrey, opened a correspondence with me to-day which I can only describe as delightful. It led to my conversion!'

'I was in bed at the time, reading,' he says, in a note written years afterwards. 'I sprang out of bed and leaped about the room rejoicing and praising God that Jesus died for me. From that day to this, I have lived under the shadow of His wings in the assurance that I am His and He is mine!'

And, writing to Mr. Dawson, the author of the letter, he says: 'I have never seen so much light as during the past few days. I know now that Jesus died for me, and that He is mine and I am His. I ought daily to be more thankful to you as the instrument by whom I was brought to Christ. Unspeakable joy !'

'It led to my conversion!'

'I know now that Jesus died for me!' 'Unspeakable joy! Unspeakable joy!'

IV

Five years, filled with happy and fruitful ministries, pass away. He is now a proud husband and the father of a little family. All at once, England is stirred to its depths by the news that Lieut. Shergold Smith and Mr. O'Neill have been murdered on the shore of Victoria Nyanza. It affects Hannington like a challenge. He longs to go and fill one of the vacant places. Unable to resist the call, he offers—and is accepted! As the time for his departure approaches, he realises the bitterness of the ordeal that he must face. His people! The congregation is in tears whenever he enters the pulpit. His wife, who had so bravely consented to his application, but who finds it so hard to let him go! His little ones! 'This,' he says, as he records the anguish of farewell, 'this was my most bitter trial—an agony that still cleaves to me—saying good-bye to the little ones. Thank God that all the pain was on one side. Over and over again I thank Him for that! "Come back soon, papa !" they cried. Then the servants, all attached to me. My wife, the bravest of them all!' Over the chapter that tells of such experiences his biographer has inscribed a quotation from Epictetus :

'If some wifeling or childling be granted you, well and good; but, if the Captain call, run to the ship, and leave such possessions behind you, not looking back!'

But, if the work had been an autobiography, and if Hannington himself had chosen the inscription for the heading of that chapter, he would have selected the words that surged through his brain every day and many times a day:

'No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God!'

'No man looking back!' cries the philosopher. 'No man looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God,' says Hannington's text.

With such words in his heart he fought his way through his valley of weeping and set out for Darkest Africa.

V

But he was driven back, as even the bravest sometimes are. In Africa he was beset by fever after fever. For weeks on end he could not rise from his mattress. His emaciation was terrible to behold. 'Can it be long before I die ?' he said one day to Cyril Gordon. 'No,' replied his companion, 'nor can you desire that it should be so !' 'I have a distinct remembrance,' says Mr. Copplestone, another member of the party, 'of one of the few walks which he was able to take with myself. "Copplestone," he said, "I do not think that I can recover from this illness. Let us go that we may choose a place for my grave." So we went, and he selected a spot where he said we were to bury him. He did not expect that he could live long in such a state as that in which he then was.' A day or two later, Mr. Stokes, who had left the party to find a road to the Lake Victoria Nyanza, unexpectedly returned. But let the diary tell its own story :

'October 6: Slightly better, but still in very great pain. To our immense surprise, Stokes turned up early this morning. When I heard his voice I exclaimed, "I shall live and not die." It inspired me with new life. I felt, that they had returned that I might go with them.'

And so they had ! He had to be carried in a hammock, however. In the course of the journey he was often at death's door. Clearly, there was nothing for it but a return to England. Yet, all the way home, he felt that he was beating a retreat.

'No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God!' The words haunted him night and day as he paced the deck of the homebound steamer.

'Forgive the one that turned back!' It is with that penitent petition that he closes this chapter of the diary.

He turned back, but not for long. He had put his hand to the plough, and he felt that, to show himself fit for the Kingdom of God, he must faithfully finish the furrow. He had solemnly given himself to Africa, and he was unwilling to take back his gift. In 1883, at the age of thirty-six, he found himself in England, rejoicing in the sweet society of wife and children and friends. Little by little his health came back to him; and with its coming, his old text said its say :

`Not fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`No man looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God!'

`No man, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the Kingdom of God!'

In Mr. Dawson's great biography, only half a dozen pages intervene between his arrival in England in June, 1883, and his consecration as Bishop of Eastern Equatorial Africa, in the June of the following year. On returning to the dark continent he is overjoyed at finding his health as robust as it formerly was precarious. 'I have to praise God,' he says, in one of his early notes, 'for one of the most successful journeys, as a journey, that I ever took. During a tramp of over four hundred miles, I have enjoyed most excellent health.' He delighted his friends by completing this preliminary march 'sunburnt and shaggy, but glowing with vigour.' Having thus tested his physical resources, he prepared for his great march to Uganda. The story of that famous and fateful journey need not be retold. It is one of the world's great romances. Everybody knows now that, all unsuspecting, the Bishop went straight to his death. A new king was on the throne : the white men were no longer in favour : the natives were ready to murder the first Englishman they saw. As soon as he drew near to the seat of government, he was seized. 'I felt,' he says in his last journal, 'that I was being dragged away to be murdered ; but I sang, "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," and laughed at the very agony of my situation.' Each day, though naked, starving, and racked with excruciating pains, he dots down in his diary the thoughts that comfort him. He can only write two or three words at a time, but he contrives to enter up the journal to the last. 'No news !' he says, in the final entry. 'I was upheld by the thirtieth Psalm, which came with great power. A hyena howled near me last night, smelling a sick man, but I hope it is not to have me yet.' The next day the native warriors, sent by the king, came to kill him. He struggled to his feet, stood erect, and told them that he was glad to die for them and for their people. Seeing them hesitate as to how to end his life, he pointed to his own gun, and, with it, they dispatched him. He was only thirty-eight. To-day a great cathedral marks the spot where he fell. 'Never in my life was I so moved,' says Bishop Tucker, 'as when I preached in that cathedral to a congregation of from four to five thousand people. Many of the communicants bore upon their bodies the scars and disfigurements of their former barbarity.' Clearly he did not die in vain.

'If,' he says, in his last letter, 'if this is the last chapter of my earthly history, then the next will be the first page of the heavenly—no blots and smudges, no incoherence, but sweet converse in the Presence of the Lamb!'

He put his hand to the plough!

He finished his furrow, never looking back!

He was fit for the Kingdom of God!

XVIII - WILLIAM WILBERFORCE'S TEXT

THE hand that struck the shackles from the galled limbs of our British slaves was the hand of a hunchback. One of the triumphs of statuary in Westminster Abbey is the seated figure that, whilst faithfully perpetuating the noble face and fine features of Wilberforce, skillfully conceals his frightful physical deformities. From infancy he was an elfish, misshapen little figure. At the Grammar School at Hull, the other boys would lift his tiny, twisted form on to the table and make him go through all his impish tricks. For, though so pitifully stunted and distorted, he was amazingly sprightly, resourceful and clever. A master of mimicry, a born actor, an accomplished singer and a perfect elocutionist, he was as agile, also, as a monkey and as full of mischief. Every day he enlivened his performance by the startling introduction of some fresh antics that convulsed alike his schoolfellows and his teachers. He is the most striking illustration that history can offer of a grotesque and insignificant form glorified by its consecration to a great and noble cause. Recognising the terrible handicap that Nature had imposed upon him, he set himself to counterbalance matters by acquiring a singular graciousness and charm of manner. He succeeded so perfectly that his courtliness and grace became proverbial. It was said of him that, if you saw him in conversation with a man, you would suppose that the man was his brother, or, if with a woman, that he was her lover. He made men forget his strange appearance. When he sprang to his feet to plead the cause of the slave, he seemed like a man inspired, and his disfigurement magically vanished. 'I saw,' says Boswell, in his letter to Mr. Dundas, 'I saw a shrimp mount the table; but, as I listened, he grew and grew until the shrimp became a whale !' When he rose to address the House of Commons, he looked like a dwarf that had jumped out of a fairy-tale; when he resumed his seat, he looked like the giant of the self-same story. His form, as the Times said, 'was like the letter S; it resembled a stick that could not be straightened.' Yet his hearers declare that his face, when pleading for the slave, was like the face of an angel. The ugliness of his little frame seemed to disappear ; and, under the magic of his passionate eloquence, his form became sublime. When, in 1833, he passed away, such a funeral procession made its way to Westminster Abbey as even London had rarely witnessed. He was borne to his last resting place by the Peers and Commons of England with the Lord Chancellor at their head. In imperishable marble it was recorded of him that 'he had removed from England the guilt of the slave-trade and prepared the way for the abolition of slavery in every colony in the Empire.' And it is said that, as the cortege made its sombre way through the crowded streets, all London was in tears, and one person in every four was garbed in deepest black.

III

It is a great thing to recognise that, though near to the kingdom, one is still outside.

Sir James Simpson, the discoverer of chloroform, used to say that the greatest discovery that he ever made was the discovery that he was a sinner and that Jesus Christ was just the Saviour he needed. John Wesley could have said the same. But, whereas Sir James Simpson was able to point to the exact date on which the sense of his need broke upon him, John Wesley is not so explicit. He tells us that it was in Georgia that he discovered that he, the would-be converter of Indians, was himself unconverted. And yet, before he left England, he wrote to a friend that his chief motive in going abroad was the salvation of his own soul. As soon as he arrived on the other side of the Atlantic, he made the acquaintance of August Spangenberg, a Moravian pastor. A conversation took place which Wesley records in his journal as having deeply impressed him.

'My brother,' said the devout and simple-minded man whose counsel he had sought, 'I must ask you one or two questions : Do you know Jesus Christ?' 'I know,' replied Wesley, after an awkward pause, 'I know that he is the Saviour of the world.'

'True,' answered the Moravian, 'but do you know that He has saved you?'

'I hope He has died to save me,' Wesley responded.

The Moravian was evidently dissatisfied with these vague replies, but he asked one more question. 'Do you know yourself I'

'I said that I did,' Wesley tells us in his journal, 'but I fear they were vain words!'

He saw others happy, fearless in the presence of death, rejoicing in a faith that seemed to transfigure their lives. What was it that was theirs and yet not his? 'Are they read in philosophy?' he asks. 'So was I in ancient or modern tongues? So was I also. Are they versed in the science of divinity? I, too, have studied it many years. Can they talk fluently upon spiritual things? I could do the same. Are they plenteous in alms? Behold, I give all my goods to feed the poor! I have laboured more abundantly than they all. Are they willing to suffer for their brethren? I have thrown up my friends, reputation, ease, country; I have put my life in my hand, wandering into strange lands; I have given my body to be devoured by the deep, parched up with heat, consumed by toil and weariness. But does all this make me acceptable to God ! Does all this make me a Christian ? By no means ! I have sinned and come short of the glory of God. I am alienated from the life of God. I am a child of wrath. I have no hope.' It is a great thing, I say, for a man who has been brought within sight of the kingdom to recognise frankly that he is, nevertheless, still outside it.

IV

It is a fine thing for a man who feels that he is outside the kingdom to enter into it.

In his 'Cheapside to Arcady,' Mr. Arthur Scammell describes the pathetic figure of an old man he often saw in a London slum. 'He had crept forth from some poor house hard by, and, propped up by a crutch, was sitting on the edge of a low wall in the unclean, sunless alley, whilst, only a few yards further on, was the pleasant open park, with sunshine, trees and flowers, the river and fresh air, and, withal, a more comfortable seat : but the poor old man never even looked that way. I have often seen him since, always in the same place, and felt that I should like to ask him why he sits there in darkness, breathing foul air, when the blessed sunshine is waiting for him only ten yards off.'

So near to the sunshine!

So near to the kingdom!

Unlike Mr. Scammell's old man, John Wesley made the great transition from shadow to sunshine, from squalor to song.

'Dost thou believe,' asked Staupitz, the wise old monk, 'dost thou believe in the forgiveness of sins ?'

'I believe,' replied Luther, reciting a clause from his familiar credo, 'I believe in the forgiveness of sins !'

'Ah,' exclaimed the elder monk, 'but you must not only believe in the forgiveness of David's sins and Peter's sins, for this even the devils believe. It is God's command that we believe our own sins are forgiven us!'

'From that moment,' says D'Aubigne, 'light sprung up in the heart of the young monk at Erfurt.'

'I believed,' says Luther, 'that my sins, even mine, were forgiven me !'

'I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation,' says Wesley, in his historic record, 'and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine!'

The analogy is suggested by the circumstance that it was Luther's commentary that was being read aloud at Aldersgate Street that night.

'My sins, even mine!' says Luther.

`My sins, even mine!' says Wesley.

Forty-five years afterwards Mr. Wesley was taken very ill at Bristol and expected to die. Calling Mr. Badford to his bedside, he observed : 'I have been reflecting on my past life. I have been wandering up and down, these many years, endeavouring, in my poor way, to do a little good to my fellow-creatures ; and now it is probable that there is but a step between me and death; and what have I to trust to for salvation ? I can see nothing which I have done or suffered that will bear looking at. I have no other plea than this :

"I the chief of sinners am,

But Jesus died for me."

Eight years later—fifty-three years after the great change at Aldersgate Street—he was actually dying. As his friends surrounded his bedside, he told them that he had no more to say. 'I said at Bristol,' he murmured, 'that

"I the chief of sinners am,

But Jesus died for me."

`Is that,' one asked, 'the present language of your heart, and do you feel now as you did then ?'"I do,' replied the dying veteran.

This, then, was the burden of Wesley's tremendous ministry for more than fifty-three years. It was the confidence of his life and the comfort of his death. It was his first thought every morning and his last every night. It was the song of his soul, the breath of his nostrils, and the light of his eyes. This was the gospel that transfigured his own experience ; and this was the gospel by which he changed the face of England. 'John Wesley,' says Mr. Birrell, 'paid more turnpikes than any man who ever bestrode a beast. Eight thousand miles was his annual record for many a long year, during each of which he seldom preached less frequently than a thousand times. No man ever lived nearer the centre than John Wesley, neither Clive, nor Pitt, nor Johnson. No single figure influenced so many minds; no single voice touched so many hearts. No other man did such a life's work for England.' The eighteenth century,' says President Wilson, 'cried out for deliverance and light; and God prepared John Wesley to show the world the might and the blessing of His salvation.'

V

The pity of it is that John Wesley was thirty-five when he entered the kingdom. The zest and vigour of his early manhood had passed. He was late in finding mercy. Thirty-five ! Before they reached that age, men like Murray McChesney, Henry Martyn, and David Brainerd had finished their lifework and fallen into honoured graves. Why was Wesley's great day so long in coming? He always felt that the fault was not altogether his own. He groped in the dark for many years and nobody helped him—not even his ministers. William Law was one of those ministers, and Wesley afterwards wrote him on the subject. 'How will you answer to our common Lord,' he asks, 'that you, sir, never led me into the light? Why did I scarcely ever hear you name the name of Christ? Why did you never urge me to faith in his blood? Is not Christ the First and the Last? If you say that you thought I had faith already, verily, you know nothing of me. I beseech you, sir, by the mercies of God, to consider whether the true reason of your never pressing this salvation upon me was not this—that you never had it yourself !'

Here is a letter for a man like Wesley to write to a man like Law ! Many a minister has since read that letter on his knees and has prayed that he may never deserve to receive so terrible a reprimand.

XX WILLIAM KNIBB'S TEXT

I

COULD anything be more perfectly beautiful, more wonderfully fair ? Far as the eye can reach in every direction, the eye is charmed and captivated by the loveliness of the landscape. As we pace the deck of the steamer as she rides at anchor in the bay, we turn from one prospect to another, uncertain as to which of them all is the most delightful. In the background the Blue Mountains stand out in sturdy and rugged grandeur against the deep blue sky. Even at this distance, we get hints of the glorious forests that clothe those graceful slopes, and of the thickly-wooded valleys that divide range from range. What a playground for the countless troops of monkeys ! What a paradise for the flocks of gorgeously-coloured birds ! Their gay plumage flashes like flames of fire amidst this riot of gigantic forestry! Nearer to the coast are the vast plains which, built up in the course of ages by tiny coral insects, now wave with their flourishing plantations and abounding fruitage. For the island is as fertile as it is fair, as rich as it is radiant! Coffee and sugar and arrowroot ; orange and lemon and grape ; cinnamon, banana and pineapple; this oval beauty spot in sunbathed tropical seas is a congenial garden for them all! Even the ocean that caresses the island seems to feel that it must assume a beauty in keeping with the loveliness of the land its waters lave. The masses of brilliant coral immediately beneath the surface impart to the shining waters a sheen of sapphire tints such as the sea but rarely boasts. 'I have spent many years,' says a modern traveler, 'in voyaging from shore to shore ; but I know of no spot under heaven where the land is so luxuriously beautiful and the ocean so extravagantly blue.' This, then, is Jamaica!

II

Could anything be more abominable, more repulsively hideous ? Life in this scene of enchantment was the life, not of paradise, but of perdition. From these fruitful plains and flowery valleys there rose to heaven, not a song of praise, but a scream of intolerable anguish. For Jamaica was the abode of slavery. All day long the men must work, and all day long the women must weep. But the men will derive no satisfaction from their labour and the women will find no comfort in their tears. They are not their own, these people; far less are they each other's. There is no such thing as marriage among these ebony-skinned, thick-lipped, woolly-haired creatures : and any unions that they form among themselves are subject to the exigencies of future sales. These little children in which the missionaries interest themselves, children with roguish eyes and laughing faces, have been bred for the market, and they will be sold as soon as their limbs are set. Young men and maidens are pretty much the same all the world over ; you may see a good deal of furtive lovemaking of an evening among the plantations. But in each lover's heart there is a dagger that Cupid never shot. For, as the stalwart youth sees his dusky sweetheart growing more shapely and more charming, he trembles lest her beauty should catch the eye of her overseer and re-- suit in her being sold to a life that is worse than a thousand deaths. The best that he can hope for is that he and she may be permitted to live together for a few years in some little hut among the bushes to produce children for sale at the monthly market. And if any slave dares to lift up his hand, or even his voice, in rebellion or resentment, there are the treadmill and the lash and the knife. The only thing that stands between the black man and a cruel death is his market value on the plantation or at the auction block. Like the asp that Cleopatra concealed among the lilies, this hideous evil cried to heaven from among the beautiful fields and forests of Jamaica. Did heaven hear such piercing cries? And, even if heaven heard, how could heaven help? We shall see ! But in order to see we must re-cross the Atlantic !

III

And here, in a narrow street in Bristol, is a printer's shop. The name over the door, comparatively freshly painted, is the name of J. G. Fuller. In the printing-room behind the shop are a couple of apprentice boys. They are brothers—Thomas and William Knibb. Mr. Fuller is the son of the Rev. Andrew Fuller of Kettering, one of the founders of the modern missionary movement. He has only recently come to Bristol, hence the newly-painted name; and he brought the two Knibbs, Kettering boys, with him. Mr. Fuller, with the impress of his father's noble character strongly upon him, at once associates himself with the Broadmead Church and Sunday School. After awhile the two apprentices, with the impress of their employer's character strongly upon them, associate themselves with the same church and take classes in the same Sunday School. It is a fine thing when a man's piety is of such an order that the youths in his workroom say among themselves : 'His religion shall be my religion and his God my God !' In due time Mr. Fuller became superintendent of the Sunday School, and made it his practice to deliver a short address before closing the school. It was one of those addresses that made history. I have heard of a man aiming at a pigeon and killing a crow, but I know of no instance in which that remarkable feat was performed on such a splendid scale as in the conversion of William Knibb. One Sunday afternoon, before dismissing the children, Mr. Fuller spoke for a few moments from the text : 'Wilt Thou not from this time cry unto me, My Father, Thou art the guide of my youth?' (Jer 3:4) Mr. Fuller aimed at the scholars, but his words smote the conscience and won the heart of a teacher, and that teacher one of his own apprentices ! 'It was a most earnest and affectionate address,' wrote William Knibb, shortly afterwards, 'and, under the divine blessing, it made a deep and, I trust, a lasting impression on my mind, and I hope that I was enabled to cast myself at the foot of the Cross as a perishing sinner, pleading for mercy for the sake of Jesus Christ and for His sake alone !' A day or two later the youth sought an interview with his employer. 'I felt ashamed,' said Knibb, in the course of this conversation with Mr. Fuller, 'I felt ashamed, being a teacher, that the address should be as suitable to me as to the children. I felt conscious that I had wandered as far from God as ever they had, and that I needed a forgiving Father and a constant guide as much as they did. I was overwhelmed. I felt such a mixture of shame and grief, of hope and love, as I had never felt before and cannot now describe. I could not join in the closing hymn. I went to my room above and yielded to my feelings. I wept bitterly and prayed as I had never prayed before. I turned the text itself into a prayer. "My Father," I cried to God, "wilt not Thou from this time be the guide of my youth?" The Lord heard my prayer and enabled me to give Him my heart ; and now it is my earnest desire to yield myself to His guidance as long as I live!'

`I needed a forgiving Father!'

`I needed a constant Guide!'

`My Father, wilt not Thou be the guide of my youth?'

`The Lord heard my prayer !' the apprentice says exultingly, as he looks gratefully into his employer's face. And when the Lord heard that prayer, He heard the bitter cry of the island whose fair shores we just now visited; for the salvation of William Knibb was the deliverance of the slaves across the seas.

IV

And yet it was not William Knibb, but Thomas, who was most concerned about the lands that lay in darkness. In setting up some copy that had come into the printing-room, the elder of the two apprentices had been startled by the crying needs of the heathen world. He longed to be a missionary. When, one day, somebody referred to the successes being achieved by native preachers, Thomas burst into tears. His younger brother asked him why he wept. 'I am greatly afraid,' Thomas replied, 'that, since the native preachers are so successful, no more white missionaries will be needed ; and I shall have no part in the evangelisation of the world !' His fears, however, were groundless. He became a missionary; was designated for Jamaica ; arrived there in January, 1823; and died of malaria just three months later. It was a dark day for the younger brother when the heavy tidings reached England. But he met the crisis, his biographer tells us, with characteristic firmness and promptitude. When the news of his brother's death was communicated to him by Mr. Fuller, his feelings were strongly excited and he wept bitterly. But, as soon as the first gush of emotion had subsided, he rose from the table and said : 'Then, if the society will accept me, go and take his place!'

A forgiving Father!

A constant Guide!

'My Father, wilt not Thou be the guide of my youth?'

In the cry of an enslaved people, fortified and intensified by a cry from his brother's grave, William Knibb recognised the leading of the Kindly Light. The 'Guide of his Youth' was pointing the way, and he bravely followed the gleam.

V

'My Father,' he cried, on that never-to-be-forgotten Sunday afternoon, 'wilt not Thou be the guide of my youth?' And not once, through all the eventful years that followed, did that clear guidance fail him! He went out to Jamaica to preach the gospel; but he soon came to feel—as Livingstone felt on the other side of the Atlantic a few years afterwards—that the work of evangelisation and the work of emancipation are inseparable. Christianity could make no terms with slavery. Little by little he was led, by the Invisible Guide whose beckoning hand he had pledged himself to follow, into a work that he had never for a moment anticipated. The sights that he witnessed sickened him; they became the ceaseless torture of his soul. He felt that no sacrifice would be too great if only he could strike the shackles from the limbs of the slaves. And he made terrific sacrifices ! The guidance that he had so passionately sought rarely led him in green pastures or beside still waters. It led him, rather, into terrible privations, relentless persecution and desolating bereavements. In that fever-laden climate he, one by one, buried his children almost as soon as they were born. One, the boy whom he named after himself, was spared to see his twelfth birthday, but the others were lowered as babes into his brother's grave. From one of these heart-rending burials after another he turned sadly away, the father-soul within him longing for life in a land in which his little ones could live. But the reformer-soul within him determined never to leave the island till all the slaves were free. On more than one occasion he was charged with rebellion, handcuffed, and dragged about the island, his persecutors heaping upon him every form of indignity that would be calculated to degrade him in the eyes of the slaves. The churches that he had erected at such cost, and in which he had taken such pride, were burned down by the slave-owners before his very eyes. He was spared no humiliation that could tend to his embarrassment and discomfiture. He visited England in order that he might stir his fellow-countrymen to righteous indignation. The whole country was moved by the passion and the pathos of those tremendous appeals. 'If I fail in arousing the sympathy of England,' he cried, 'I will go back to Jamaica and call upon Him who hath made of one blood all nations upon the earth. And if I die without beholding the emancipation of my brethren and sisters in Christ, then, if prayer is permitted in Heaven, I will fall at the feet of the Eternal, crying: "Lord, open the eyes of Christians in England to see the evil of slavery and to banish it from the earth !" ' But the people heard; and the Parliament heard; and the prayer of his passionate heart was granted him.

VI

'Wilt not Thou be the Guide of my youth?' he cried.

And the Guide led to the goal ! As a result of Mr. Knibb's tireless activities, the slaves were freed ! Their emancipation came into force at midnight on July 31, 1838. And what is this? As the historic hour draws near, the exultant slaves gather in their thousands at the church. During the evening, hymns are sung, the excited blacks joining in the praise with a zest that even they have never shown before. As the night deepens the emotion becomes more intense. As the hand of the clock approaches the midnight hour, Mr. Knibb, standing in the pulpit, shouts, 'The Monster is dying!' As the clock begins to strike he cries again : 'The Monster is dying!' And when the hour has fully struck he proclaims : 'The Monster is dead !' The scene is indescribable. 'Never,' wrote Knibb, 'was heard such a sound. The winds of freedom appeared to have been let loose. The very building shook at the strange, yet sacred, joy. Oh, had my boy, my lovely, freedom-loving boy, been there ! Alas, he is sleeping undisturbed in the churchyard, nor can the sweet sounds he so much loved awake him from his rest !' In passionate longing to have at least one of his children associated with that glad historic event, Mr. Knibb slips across to his home, draws his twelve-months' old baby from his cot, and, midnight though it is, returns with the child in his arms, and holds him proudly up before the shouting, clapping, singing multitude. In the early grey of the morning, a most remarkable burial takes place in the churchyard. One might almost say, in the words of Mrs. Alexander :

That was the grandest funeral That ever passed on earth.

coffin, and have dug a deep, deep grave. Into the coffin they throw the slave-chain, a slave-whip, a slave-hat, and an iron collar—all the insignia of their degradation. The great crowd of grateful freemen gathers round the open grave and a solemn funeral service is held. At the proper moment, the coffin is lowered into the yawning grave, the multitude singing exultingly :

'Now, Slavery, we lay thy vile form in the dust, And, buried for ever, there let it remain:
And rotted, and covered with infamy's rust, Be every man-whip and fetter and chain.'

The land rings with doxologies. The beautiful island is delivered from its hideous curse ! The Guide has led to the goal! The chains are shattered! The slaves are free !

VII

Among the people whom he loved so well, the people whom he had emancipated and evangelised, Knibb died a few years later. He was only forty-two when he passed away. 'I am not afraid to die,' he said ; 'the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, both of omission and commission; that blood is my only trust !' And, just as the gentle spirit was about to take its flight, he reached out his hand to Mrs. Knibb and murmured : 'Mary, it is all right : all is well!'

'My Father,' he cried, at the dawn of his career,
'My Father, will not Thou be the Guide of my youth?'
'It is all right: all is well!' he murmured in the last moments of his life.

The Guide had led to the goal! Under sure, safe, skilful pilotage, the ship had made a good voyage and had come straight to port! William Knibb had cast his anchor within the veil! 'It is all right : all is well!' Such is the final gladness of all who follow faithfully the Kindly Light!

XXI - JOHN NEWTON'S TEXT

JOHN NEWTON was plagued with a terribly treacherous memory. In his youth it had betrayed and nearly ruined him ; how could he ever trust it again? 'You must know,' said Greatheart to Christiana's boys, 'you must know that Forgetful Green is the most dangerous place in all these parts.' John Newton understood, better than any man who ever lived, exactly what Greatheart meant. Poor John Newton nearly lost his soul on Forgetful Green. His autobiography is filled with the sad, sad story of his forgettings. 'I forgot,' he says again and again and again, 'I forgot . . . ! I soon forgot . . . ! This, too, I totally forgot!' The words occur repeatedly. And so it came to pass that when, after many wild and dissolute years, he left the sea and entered the Christian ministry, he printed a certain text in bold letters, and fastened it right across the wall over his study mantelpiece :

THOU SHALT REMEMBER THAT THOU WAST
A BONDMAN IN THE LAND OF EGYPT, AND THE LORD THY GOD REDEEMED THEE.

A photograph of that mantelpiece lies before me as I write. There, clearly enough, hangs John Newton's text ! In sight of it he prepared every sermon. In this respect John Newton resembled Thomas Goodwin. 'When,' says that sturdy Puritan, in a letter to his son, 'when I was threatening to become cold in my ministry, and when I felt Sabbath morning coming and my heart not filled with amazement at the grace of God, or when I was making ready to dispense the Lord's Supper, do you know what I used to do ? I used to take a turn up and down among the sins of my past life, and I always came down again with a broken and contrite heart, ready to preach, as it was preached in the beginning, the forgiveness of sins.' I do not think,' he says again, 'I ever went up the pulpit stair that I did not stop for a moment at the foot of it and take a turn up and down among the sins of my past years. I do not think that I ever planned a sermon that I did not take a turn round my study-table and look back at the sins of my youth and of all my life down to the present ; and many a Sabbath morning, when my soul had been cold and dry for the lack of prayer during the week, a turn up and down in my past life before I went into the pulpit always broke my hard heart and made me close with the gospel for my own soul before I began to preach.' Like this great predecessor of his, Newton felt that, in his pulpit preparation, he must keep his black, black past ever vividly before his eyes.

'I forgot . . . I soon forgot . . . ! This, too,
I totally forgot!'

'Thou shalt remember, remember, remember!'

'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!'

II

`A bondman!

`Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman!

The words were literally true! For some time Newton was a slavetrader; but, worse still, for some time he was a slave ! Newton's conversion deserves to be treasured among the priceless archives of the Christian church because of the amazing transformation it effected. It seems incredible that an Englishman could fall as low as he did. As Professor Goldwin Smith says, he was a brand plucked from the very heart of the burning! Losing his mother—the one clear guiding-star of his early life —when he was seven, he went to sea when he was eleven. 'I went to Africa,' he tells us, 'that I might be free to sin to my heart's content.' During the next few years his soul was seared by the most revolting and barbarous of all human experiences. He endured the extreme barbarities of a life before the mast; he fell into the pitiless clutches of the pressgang; as a deserter from the navy he was flogged until the blood streamed down his back; and he became involved in the unspeakable atrocities of the African slave trade. And then, going from bad to worse, he actually became a slave himself ! The slave of a slave! He was sold to a negress who, glorying in her power over him, made him depend for his food on the crusts that she tossed under her table! He could sound no lower depth of abject degradation. In the after-years, he could never recall this phase of his experience without a shudder. As he says in the epitaph that he composed for himself, he was 'the slave of slaves.'

`A bondman!

`A slave of slaves! A bondman of bondman!' `Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman!

How could he ever forget?

III

How, I say, could he ever forget? And yet he had forgotten other things scarcely less notable.

As a boy, he was thrown from a horse and nearly killed. Looking death in the face in this abrupt and untimely way, a deep impression was made. 'But,' he says, 'I soon forgot!'

Some years later, he made an appointment with some companions to visit a man-of-war. They were to meet at the waterside at a certain time and row out to the battleship. But the unexpected happened. Newton was detained; his companions left without him; the boat was upset and they were drowned. 'I went to the funeral,' Newton says, 'and was exceedingly affected. But this, also, I soon forgot!'

Then came a remarkable dream. Really, he was lying in his hammock in the forecastle of a ship homeward bound from Italy. But, in his fancy, he was back at Venice. It was midnight; the ship, he thought, was riding at anchor ; and it was his watch on deck. As, beneath a clear Italian sky, he paced to and fro across the silent vessel, a stranger suddenly approached him. This mysterious visitant gave him a beautiful ring. 'As long as you keep it,' he said, 'you will be happy and successful; but, if you lose it, you will know nothing but trouble and misery.' The stranger vanished. Shortly after, a second stranger appeared on deck. The newcomer pointed to the ring. 'Throw it away !' he cried, 'throw it away!' Newton was horrified at the proposal; but he listened to the arguments of the stranger and at length consented. Going to the side of the ship, he flung the ring into the sea. Instantly the land seemed ablaze with a range of volcanoes in fierce eruption, and he understood that all those terrible flames had been lit for his destruction. The second stranger vanished; and, shortly after, the first returned. Newton fell at his feet and confessed everything. The stranger entered the water and regained the ring. 'Give it me!' Newton cried, in passionate entreaty, 'give it me !' 'No,' replied the stranger, 'you have shown that you are unable to keep it ! I will preserve it for you, and, whenever you need it, will produce it on your behalf.' This dream,' says Newton, 'made a very great impression ; but the impression soon wore off, and, in a little time, I totally forgot it!'

'I forgot!'

'This, too, I soon forgot!'

'In a little time, I totally forgot it!'

So treacherous a thing was Newton's memory ! Is it any wonder that he suspected it, distrusted it, feared it? Is it any wonder that, right across his study wall, he wrote that text?

'Thou shalt remember!'

'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman!'

'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman, and that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!'

IV

'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman!'

'Thou shalt remember that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!'

But how? Was the work of grace in John Newton's soul a sudden or a gradual one ? It is difficult to say. It is always difficult to say.

The birth of the body is a very sudden and yet a very gradual affair : so also is the birth of the soul. To say that John Newton was suddenly converted would be to ignore those gentle and gracious influences by which two good women—his mother and his sweetheart—led him steadily heavenwards. 'I was born,' Newton himself tells us, 'in a home of godliness, and dedicated to God in my infancy. I was my mother's only child, and almost her whole employment was the care of my education.' Every day of her life she prayed with him as well as for him, and every day she sought to store his mind with those majestic and gracious words that, once memorised, can never be altogether shaken from the mind. It was the grief of her deathbed that she was leaving her boy, a little fellow of seven, at the mercy of a rough world; but she had sown the seed faithfully, and she hoped for a golden harvest.

Some years later, John Newton fell in love with Mary Catlett. She was only thirteen—the age of Shakespeare's Juliet. But his passion was no passing fancy. 'His affection for her,' says Professor Goldwin Smith, 'was as constant as it was romantic ; his father frowned on the engagement, and he became estranged from home; but through all his wanderings and sufferings he never ceased to think of her ; and after seven years she became his wife.' The Bishop of Durham, in a centennial sermon, declares that Newton's pure and passionate devotion to this simple and sensible young girl was 'the one merciful anchor that saved him from final self-abandonment.' Say that Newton's conversion was sudden, therefore, and you do a grave injustice to the memory of two women whose fragrant influence should never be forgotten.

And yet it was sudden; so sudden that Newton could tell the exact date and name the exact place! It took place on the tenth of March, 1748, on board a ship that was threatening to founder in the grip of a storm. 'That tenth of March,' says Newton, 'is a day much to be remembered by me; and I have never suffered it to pass unnoticed since the year 1748. For on that day—March 10, 1748—the Lord came from on high and delivered me out of deep waters.' The storm was terrific : when the ship went plunging down into the trough of the seas few on board expected her to come up again. The hold was rapidly filling with water. As Newton hurried to his place at the pumps he said to the captain, 'If this will not do, the Lord have mercy upon us!' His own words startled him.

'Mercy!' he said to himself, in astonishment, 'mercy! mercy! What mercy can there be for me ? This was the first desire I had breathed for mercy for many years! About six in the evening the hold was free from water, and then came a gleam of hope. I thought I saw the hand of God displayed in our favour. I began to pray. I could not utter the prayer of faith. I could not draw near to a reconciled God and call Him Father. My prayer for mercy was like the cry of the ravens, which yet the Lord Jesus does not disdain to hear.'

'In the gospel,' says Newton, in concluding the story of his conversion, 'in the gospel I saw at least a peradventure of hope; but on every other side I was surrounded with black, unfathomable despair.' On that 'peradventure of hope' Newton staked everything. On the tenth of March, 1748, he sought mercy—and found it! He was then twenty-three.

V

Years afterwards, when he entered the Christian ministry, John Newton began making history. He made it well. His hand is on the nation still. He changed the face of England. He began with the church. In his 'History of the Church of England,' Wakeman gives us a sordid and terrible picture of the church as Newton found it. The church was in the grip of the political bishop, the fox-hunting parson, and an utterly worldly and materialistic laity. Spiritual leadership was unknown. John Newton and a few kindred spirits, 'the first generation of the clergy called "evangelical," ' became—to use Sir James Stephen's famous phrase—'the second founders of the Church of England.' There is scarcely a land beneath the sun that has been unaffected by Newton's influence. As one of the founders of the Church Missionary Society, he laid his hand upon all our continents and islands. Through the personalities of his converts, too, he wielded a power that is impossible to compute. Take two, by way of illustration. Newton was the means of the conversion of Claudius Buchanan and Thomas Scott. In due time Buchanan carried the gospel to the East Indies, and wrote a book which led Adoniram Judson to undertake his historic mission to Burmah. Scott became one of the most powerful writers of his time, and, indeed, of all time. Has not Cardinal Newman confessed that it was Scott's treatment of the doctrine of the Trinity that preserved his faith, in one of the crises of his soul, from total shipwreck? And what ought to be said of Newton's influence on men like Wilberforce and Cowper, Thornton and Venn? One of our greatest literary critics has affirmed that the friendship of Newton saved the intellect of Cowper. 'If, said Prebendary H. E. Fox, not long ago, 'if Cowper had never met Newton, the beautiful hymns in the Olney collection, and that noble poem, "The Task" —nearest to Milton in English verse—would never have been written.' Moreover, there are Newton's own hymns. Wherever, to this day, congregations join in singing 'How Sweet the Name of Jesus Sounds,' or 'Glorious Things of Thee are Spoken,' or 'One There is Above All Others,' or 'Amazing Grace, how Sweet the Sound,' there John Newton is still at his old task, still making history!

VI

'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman!' 'Thou shalt remember that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!' (Deut 15:15)

See also Deut 24:18

From that time forth Newton's treacherous memory troubled him no more. He never again forgot. He never could. He said that when, from the hold of the sinking ship, he cried for mercy, it seemed to him that the Saviour looked into his very soul.

Sure, never till my latest breath, Can I forget that look ;
It seemed to charge me with His death, Though not a word He spoke.

`I forgot . . I soon forgot . . This, too, I totally forgot!
`Thou shalt remember that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!

`Never till my latest breath can I forget that look!' The Rev. Richard Cecil, M.A., who afterwards became his biographer, noticing that Newton was beginning to show signs of age, urged him one day to stop preaching and take life easily. 'What!' he replied, 'shall the old African blasphemer stop while he can speak at all?' He could not forget. And he was determined that nobody else should! In order that future generations might know that he was a bondman and had been redeemed, he wrote his own epitaph and expressly directed that this—this and no other—should be erected for him :

JOHN NEWTON,
Clerk,
Once an Infidel and Libertine,
A Servant of Slaves in Africa, was
by the Mercy of our Lord and Saviour
Jesus Christ,
Preserved, Restored, Pardoned,
And Appointed to Preach the Faith he had so long laboured to destroy.

No; that treacherous memory of his never betrayed him again! When he was an old, old man, very near the close of his pilgrimage, William Jay, of Bath, one day met him in the street. Newton complained that his powers were failing fast. 'My memory,' he said, 'is nearly gone; but I remember two things, that I am a great sinner and that Christ is a great Saviour !'

`Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!'—that was John Newton's text.

`My memory is nearly gone; but I remember two things, that I am a great sinner and that Christ is a great Saviour!'—that was John Newton's testimony.

VII

I forgot . . I soon forgot . . This, too, I totally forgot!
`Thou shalt remember, remember, remember!

Newton liked to think that the memory that had once so basely betrayed him—the memory that, in later years, he had so sternly and perfectly disciplined—would serve him still more delightfully in the life beyond. Cowper died a few years before his friend; and Newton liked to picture to himself their reunion in heaven. He wrote a poem in which he represented himself as grasping Cowper's hand and rapturously addressing him :

Oh! let thy memory wake! I told thee so; I told thee thus would end thy heaviest woe; I told thee that thy God would bring thee here,
And God's own hand would wipe away thy tear, While I should claim a mission by thy side; I told thee so—for our Emmanuel died.

`Oh! let thy memory wake!
'I forgot . . I soon forgot . . This, too, I totally forgot!
`Thou shalt remember that the Lord thy God redeemed thee!

Newton felt certain that the joyous recollection of that infinite redemption would be the loftiest bliss of the life that is to be.

XXII - ANDREW FULLER'S TEXT

THE Magic Music! What is the Magic Music? Ever since the world began, poets have let their truant fancies play about it, but none of them have told us what it is. They have sung to us of the bells that peal under the sea, of the songs that are heard in the storm, and of sirens that sing on the shore. They have told us of cities that mysteriously rose to the strains of the lyre of Orpheus; and they have told us of cities rendered desolate by the fatal lure of the piper's lute; but none of them have described those resistless strains, those bewitching harmonies, that magic and marvelous music! What is it? We must try to find out!

II

Right away down among the swamps of the Red River district, three slaves sit huddled together at the close of a cruel and exhausting day. Two of them are women : the third is Uncle Tom. Seeing that they are too tired to grind their corn, Tom has ground it for them; and, touched by such uncommon sympathy, they have baked his cake for him. Tom sits down by the light of the fire and draws out his Bible, for he has need of comfort.

`What's that?' says one of the women.

`A Bible!' Tom answers.

`Laws a me! And what's that ? Read a piece, anyways !' exclaimed the woman, curiously, seeing Tom poring so attentively over it.

`Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!' (Mt 11:28)

`Them's good enough words!' exclaimed the astonished woman. 'Who says 'em?'

And, beginning with those 'good words,' Tom tells her the story of Jesus. But let us change the scene!

We are at the Isle of Wight. And here, in the lovely little church at Newport, is the memorial that Oueen Victoria erected to the memory of the Princess Elizabeth. It is by Marochetti, and represents, as Mr. William Canton says, one of the most touching scenes that a sculptor has ever put into marble. It is the figure of a fair young girl in the quaintly pretty dress of the, Stuart days. Her eyes are closed; her lips are parted with the last faint sigh. One arm is laid upon her waist; the other has fallen by her side, with the little hand half open—it will never more hold anything. Her left cheek is resting upon an open Bible, and her long ringlets are scattered across the page, but you can read the verse :

`Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!'

Let us change the scene again! We are at Hippo, in Northern Africa. It is the fifth century. Augustine bends over his desk. Let us glance over his shoulder ! What is it that he is writing? 'I have read in Plato and in Cicero,' he says, 'many sayings that are very wise and very beautiful, but I never read in either of them such words as these : "Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest."'

`Those are good words!' says the slave woman, as she listens in astonishment to the reading of Uncle Tom.

`Those are good words!' says Queen Victoria, as she selects them for inclusion in the sculptor's masterpiece.

`Those are good words!' says Augustine, as he contrasts them with the wealthiest treasures of heathen mines.

Here, then, are words that could pour new hope into the empty heart of a despairing slave; words that could minister consolation and delight to the soul of the world's mightiest sovereign ; words that could ravish the mind of an old-world scholar and saint. Here, if anywhere, we have the Magic Music !

`Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!'

III

A Slave's text! A Queen's text! A Bishop's text! And Andrew Fuller's Text!

Andrew Fuller made history in three several ways. To begin at the beginning, he made history by means of his exquisitely beautiful life at home. One of his sons—Andrew G. Fuller, of Wolverhampton—wrote in his old age a biography of his father. There were several such works already in existence. But, in reading them, the second Andrew Fuller felt that none of them had touched the real secret of his father's influence and power. He, therefore, took his pen, when nearly eighty years of age, and wrote his book as a filial tribute to the loveliness, the unselfishness and the nobleness of his father's life in the home. Another of Andrew Fuller's sons—Mr. J. G. Fuller—set up, we have seen, as a printer at Bristol. He engaged as his apprentice a young fellow named William Knibb. Moved by his father's spirit, the master was soon the means of his assistant's conversion. Having been led to the Saviour by Mr. Fuller, William Knibb became the great evangelist of the West Indies and the historic deliverer of the slaves. When the glad shout of the emancipated blacks echoed through the world, nobody thought of Andrew Fuller ; yet to Andrew Fuller's influence that joyous event was directly traceable.

Andrew Fuller made history by means of one of the most scrupulously conscientious ministries that we have on record. One illustration must suffice. As a young man of six and twenty, he was minister of the little church at Soham. The membership of the church was less than forty; his salary was fifteen pounds a year; and he was far from being happy. The congregation was sharply divided on acute doctrinal questions ; several of the leading members treated him with coldness and some with bitterness; and every sermon that he preached was subjected to the most pitiless criticism. At this juncture he was called to the important charge at Kettering. The invitation assured him a much larger congregation, a much larger salary, and absolute unanimity. Yet for two years he hesitated as to the course that he ought to pursue. It seemed to him that the souls of the people at Soham had been committed to his care ; and how could he give account of them in the Day of Judgement if he lightly forsook them? The very troubles of the church made it more difficult for his conscience to consent to its abandonment. As Dr. Ryland has remarked, 'many men would risk the fate of an empire with fewer searchings of heart than it cost Andrew Fuller to determine whether he should leave a little dissenting church of less than forty members.' But that was the man ! And in that spirit he lived and laboured to the end of his days.

But, most memorably of all, Andrew Fuller made history as one of our great missionary pioneers. When, it has been finely said, when it pleased God to awaken from her slumbers a drowsy and lethargic church, there rang out, from the belfry of the ages, a clamorous and insistent alarm; and, in that arousing hour, the hand upon the bell-rope was the hand of William Carey. Yes, Carey's was the hand that grasped the rope; but Fuller stood beside him when he did it. They were partners in the greatest of all human enterprises. When Carey preached his famous sermon—the sermon that awoke the world—Fuller stood beside the pulpit. And Carey was only able to go to India because Fuller undertook to arouse interest and organise the Church's resources at home. 'You go down into the mine,' said Fuller to Carey, 'and we will hold the ropes !' How well he fulfilled his promise, let his biographers tell. By holding those ropes, Andrew Fuller made history.

IV

Andrew Fuller was a farmer's son, and, to the end of his days, he dearly loved the fields. As a boy, he revelled in the life of the village and the countryside. We get glimpses of him searching for birds' nests in the woods, killing snakes in the lane, and sitting with other boys beside the great fire in the village smithy. Yet, even in those early days, he was conscious of a hunger in his heart that none of these pursuits could satisfy. He attended his mother's church, but the minister did not help him. Mr. Eve was a representative of that grim and stern old theology that set the poor boy trembling in every limb but offered him no refuge from the terrors it presented. The more he heard, the more miserable he became. In his distress, he collected such books as he could find. He read Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and 'Grace Abounding,' and Erskine's 'Gospel Sonnets.' I read,' he says, 'and as I read I wept. Indeed, I was almost overcome with weeping, so interesting did the doctrine of eternal salvation appear to me.' But how to make that great salvation his ? There lay the problem. He discovered that one of his father's labourers was a very religious man. He followed this man into the fields and stables and barns, hoping that he would drop some word that would dispel the horror of his mind; but no emancipating word was spoken. The quest seemed hopeless. At the age of fifteen he almost abandoned the search. 'I thought,' he says, 'of giving up in despair ; why not forget it and take my fill of sin?' But the very idea sent a shudder through all his frame. His heart revolted. 'What!' he said to himself, 'can I give up Christ and hope and heaven?'

Then, one never-to-be-forgotten day, his ears were ravished by the Magic Music! He heard the text :

'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!'

He looked away from self, his son tells us; and fixed his eyes upon a crucified Saviour; his guilt and fears began to dissolve like the snows of winter under the silent influence of spring-time warmth.

He was in such dire extremity that, whether it accorded with the teachings of Mr. Eve or not, he determined to venture everything upon Christ !

'Come unto me!' said the Matchless Music.

'I must!' his soul made answer. 'I must and I will! Yes, I will, I will! I trust my soul—my lost and sinful soul—in His hands! I come, I come! And if I perish, I perish!' The words are copied from his own account of that memorable experience.

'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!'

He came; and, in coming, he found the rest that was promised, the rest he had so diligently sought. 'I should have found it sooner,' he says, 'if I had not entertained the notion of my having no warrant to come to Christ without some previous qualification. I mention this,' he adds, 'because it may be the case with others who may be kept in darkness and despondency by such views much longer than I was.'

V

During the years that followed, Andrew Fuller had his full share of trouble. Whilst he lay ill in one room, his (laughter, a little girl of six, died in the room adjoining.

'I heard a whispering,' he says, 'and then all were silent. All were silent ! But all is well. I feel reconciled to God. I called my family around my bed. I sat up and prayed with them as well as I could. I bowed my head and worshipped a taking as well as a giving God!'

Some time afterwards, Mrs. Fuller lost her reason. In her frenzy she fancied that he was not her husband,' but an impostor, who had entered the house and taken all that belonged to her. She regarded him as her bitterest enemy and made every effort to escape. She had to be watched night and day. Just before her death, however, a sudden calm stole over her. 'I was weeping,' Mr. Fuller says, 'and the sight of my tears seemed to awaken her recollection. Fixing her eyes upon me, she exclaimed, "Why, are you indeed my husband ?" "Indeed, my dear, I am !" She then drew near and kissed me several times. My heart dissolved with a mixture of grief and joy. Her senses were restored, and she talked as rationally as ever.' A fortnight later she laid a little child in the father's arms and then passed quietly away.

Then again, her eldest boy proved wayward and gave him serious trouble. He ran away to sea. It was reported that, as a result of a misadventure, he had received three hundred lashes, and had died under the punishment. 'Oh,' cried the father, when he heard of it, 'this is heart trouble! My boy, my boy! He cried and I heard him not ! O Absalom! my son ! my son! Would God I had died for thee, my son, my son!'

It turned out, however, that the rumour was false. Robert was still alive, and the letters that his father wrote him are among the tenderest and most persuasive in our literature. There is every reason to believe that their pleadings had the effect that the father most desired. 'I was exceedingly intimate with Robert,' wrote a shipmate long afterwards. 'We freely opened our minds to each other. He was a very pleasing youth and became a true Christian man.' The news of his death, however, was a terrible blow to Mr. Fuller. On the Sunday following its reception, he broke down completely in the pulpit, and the whole congregation wept with him.

But, through all the clash of feeling and the tumult of emotion, the bells were ringing under the sea. The Magic Music never ceased. 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!'

That rest was never broken. When he lay dying at the last, he called Dr. Ryland to receive his final testimony. 'I have no other hope of salvation,' he said, 'than through the atonement of my Lord and Saviour. With this hope I can go into eternity with composure.'

'I will give you rest!'

'I go into eternity with composure!'

Rest! Composure! , So steadfastly was the promise kept to the very, very last !

VI

As a boy, I came under the influence of a fine old clergyman—Canon Hoare, the rector of Holy Trinity, Tunbridge Wells—a man very highly esteemed in the South of England. I can see him now, tall, stately and grey, my beau ideal of all that a minister should be. In his study there hung a very beautiful and telling picture. It represented a shipwreck from which one life was being saved. In confidential moments, Canon Hoare would tell the story of the picture. It seems that, years ago, a very wealthy man called to arrange with him about his burial-place. The Canon walked round the churchyard with him, and, after inspecting several possible positions, the gentleman at last selected the spot in which he wished his bones to rest. This business completed, they paused for a second or two, listening to the birds, and then the Canon turned to his companion and said

*Well, now; you have chosen a resting-place for your body. Have you yet found a resting-place for your soul?'

There was silence for a moment, and then, turning full upon the Canon, the gentleman exclaimed :

'You are the first man who ever asked me that question !'

It set him thinking. He sought and found the resting-place, the only resting-place, Andrew Fuller's resting-place; and he sent the Canon the picture as a token of his gratitude. He felt that this was the life that had been saved from shipwreck. 'The Matchless Music!'

'A Resting-place for the Soul!' 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy-laden, and I will give you rest!' He who has heard that music, and found that resting-place, will smile at all the buffetings of time and pass into eternity with composure.

XXIII STEPHEN GRELLET'S TEXT

A RESTLESS and adventurous Quaker was Stephen Grellet. He yearned to live to the age of Methuselah, and, had his wish been granted, he would have made good use of every moment of his time. The marvel is, however, that he lived to be eighty-two. He was nearly hanged to a lamp-post by infuriated revolutionists in Paris; he was twice faced with death by drowning—once in a swollen mill-race and once at a flooded ford ; he twice fell into the hands of pirates from whose cutlasses he had good reason to expect a hasty despatch; and, in the course of his tireless travels amidst populations that were being ravaged by plagues and pestilences, he was laid low again and again. More than once he gave specific instructions concerning the burial of his body. But each time he rose from his fevered couch and continued his tireless pilgrimage. He passed from country to country with as little concern as some men feel in passing from village to village. He learned language after language in order that he might preach the Word in every hole and corner of the earth. He stood before Emperors and Kings, speaking to crowned heads with the naturalness and ease with which he addressed the children at home. He found his way into prisons and workhouses; into slave camps and thieves' kitchens ; he lost no opportunity of preaching to all kinds and conditions of men the words of everlasting life. His is one of the most remarkable evangelistic careers on record.

II

He yearned to live as long as Methuselah; but he discovered that he could live longer still. That discovery is, in a word, the explanation of his life. Let him tell his own story. 'One evening,' he says, 'I was walking in the fields alone, my mind being under no kind of religious concern, nor in the least excited by anything I had heard or thought of.' Suddenly, explain it how you may, the solitudes of that vast American forest declined any longer to be dumb. They became vocal with wondrous speech. The wayward winds and the rustling leaves were all whispering and caroling and shouting and echoing the same wonderful word. 'I was arrested,' he says, 'by what seemed to be an awful voice proclaiming the word, "Eternity! Eternity! Eternity!" It reached my very soul—my whole man shook—it brought me, like Saul, to the ground. The great depravity and sinfulness of my heart were set open before me. . . After this, I spent most of my time in retirement. I began to read the Bible. O, what sweetness did I then feel! It was indeed a memorable day. I was like one introduced into a new world; the creation, and all things around me, bore a different aspect—my heart glowed with love to all. The awfulness of that visitation can never cease to be remembered with peculiar interest and gratitude, as long as I have the use of my mental faculties. I have been as one plucked from a burning house rescued from the brink of a horrible pit! . . . How can I set forth the fullness of heavenly joy that filled me? I saw that there was One that was able to save me. I saw Him to be the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world. I felt faith in His atoning blood. Floods of tears of joy and gratitude gave vent to the fullness of my heart!* And all through one word 'a. word that reached my very soul, shook my whole man, and brought me to the ground!—that word Eternity!'

Eternity!

Eternity!

III

Eternity! Eternity! The very word is the stateliest cathedral of human speech. It is the transcendent triumph of articulation. It stands among the few real sublimities of our vocabulary. It is one of those magnificences of language that defy all definition, one of those splendours of expression that leave nothing to be said.

Oh, the clanging bells of Time!
How their changes rise and fall;
But in undertone sublime,
Sounding clearly through them all
Is a voice that must be heard,
As our moments onward flee;
And it speaketh aye one word,
Eternity ! Eternity

That insistent voice is the voice that Stephen Grellet heard in the leafy solitudes that memorable evening. 'Eternity! Eternity! Eternity!' The word falls upon the ear like the booming of the ocean on the crags along the coast. It rings and echoes and reverberates and resounds through all the intricate avenues and the tortuous corridors of the soul. The whole being trembles at its utterance as the abbey shudders to the organ's diapason. Every faculty is awed into stillness ; the soul is hushed into worship. The word has all the music of the spheres within its syllables; and, when it has been spoken, all attempts at amplification or explanation become pitiful impertinences.

Eternity!

Eternity!

IV

Eternity!

Eternity!

The classic use of the word occurs in Mrs. Beecher Stowe's historic masterpiece. Poor Uncle Tom, having fallen into the hands of the wretched and brutal Legree, had been thrashed within an inch of his life. He lay bleeding, and writhing in anguish, in the old slave-shed. But his soul was not in the shed. For, as the solemn light of dawn—the angelic glory of the morning star—looks in through the rude window, Tom thinks of the Bright and Morning Star. He ponders on' the Great White Throne, with its ever-radiant rainbow; the whiterobed multitude, with voices as many waters; the crowns, the palms, the harps; these may all break upon his vision before that sun shall set again. And, therefore, without shuddering or trembling, he hears the voice of his persecutor:

'How would ye like to be tied to a tree, and have a slow fire lit up around ye ?' asks Legree. 'Wouldn't that be pleasant, eh, Tom ?'

'Mas'r, says Tom, *I know ye can do dreadful things, but'—he stretched himself upward and clasped his hands—'but after ye've killed the body, there ain't no more ye can do. And, oh ! there's all Eternity to come after that!

Eternity!

'Eternity! exclaims Mrs. Beecher Stowe, 'the word thrills through the black man's soul with light and power as he utters it ; it thrills through the sinner's soul, too, like the bite of a scorpion.'

Eternity!

Eternity!

Eternity!

Eternity!

It is one of the overpowering immensities of our faith, and we preachers must make the most of it. The people are sick and tired of trifles. The day of catch-penny titles and silly subjects is as dead as the dodo. It ought never to have dawned. It is a page in church history over which every true minister of the New Testament will blush whenever he comes upon it. The man who announces as his theme a subject that is beneath the dignity of the eternal harmonies can never have heard the music of the choir invisible. He can never have seen the Lord high and lifted up. He can never have heard the seraphs that cry continually : 'Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts; the whole earth is full of His glory!*' The lips that have been touched with the glowing coal from the altar can never again be lent to ecclesiastical frivolity. It is wrong ; it is wicked ; it is shameful. And, to quote a famous but sinister phrase, 'it is not only a crime, it is a blunder.' For the people are impatient of trivialities. The hearts of men are hungry for the most stupendous themes. They like great preaching. The big subjects draw the big crowds. Little children amidst city squalor love to put the sea-shells to their ears because in them they catch the murmur of fathomless seas and limitless oceans; and children of a larger growth turn from much that is sordid in their environment to the preacher who helps them to hear the music of the infinite.

Eternity!

Eternity!

VI

Eternity!

Eternity!

The best illustration of my theme occurs in the life of Dr. Thomas Chalmers. It is a dramatic page in a wonderful spiritual experience. Let me briefly marshal the facts. As a mere boy, having matriculated at twelve, become a divinity student at fifteen, and been licensed to preach at nineteen, Chalmers becomes a minister at Kilmany. He devotes himself to mathematics. On Sundays he thunders to decent Presbyterians against murder and adultery; and during the week he seeks to prepare himself to succeed Professor Playfair in the Mathematical Chair of Edinburgh University. He writes a pamphlet, in which he says : 'The author of this pamphlet can assert from what to him is the highest of all authority—the authority of his own experience that, after the satisfactory discharge of his parish duties, a minister may enjoy five days in the week of uninterrupted leisure for the prosecution of any science in which his taste may dispose him to engage.' Then follow his illness, his marvellous conversion, and his new ministry. Has Scotland ever known a life more rich in spiritual influence or more fruitful of evangelistic fervour? And in the course of that historic ministry, in a debate before the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, Chalmers' early pamphlet is quoted in support of the low views it advocates. Chalmers is stung to the quick. He rises and makes one of his very greatest speeches. And, in closing, he exclaims : 'Yes, sir, I penned it, strangely blinded that I was! I aspired in those days to be a professor of mathematics. But what, sir, is the object of mathematical science? Magnitude, and the proportion of magnitude ! But in those days, sir, I had forgotten two magnitudes—I thought not of the littleness of Time, and I recklessly thought not of the greatness of Eternity!'

Eternity!

Eternity!

VII

Eternity!

Eternity!

I recently took a long, long railway journey. Through a thousand miles of civilisation, a thousand miles of desert, and a thousand miles of bush, the train bore me to a part of this vast continent in which I found myself surrounded by trees that were entirely new to me, and by flowers such as I had never seen before. I freely expressed my admiration, and, when the time came to commence my homeward journey, I found among the mementoes with which I was presented a beautiful bunch of everlastings. A Bunch of Everlastings! It seems to me I have this morning been gathering just such a bouquet. Here is Stephen Grellet Hstening to the great word that rings through the silence of the forest, 'Eternity! Eternity! Eternity!' Here is Uncle Tom uttering the same word with strange and wonderful effects: 'Eternity!' Here is Dr. Chalmers confessing that the mistakes of his life lay in his forgetting the greatness of Eternity! The list could be indefinitely continued; the valleys are full of everlastings. 'That night,' says Ebenezer Erskine, in recording in the pages of his diary the greatest spiritual crisis that he ever knew, 'that night I got my head out of Time into Eternity!' 'The vastness of the word Eternity was impressed upon me,' says Andrew Bonar in his diary; and, a few months later, he says again, 'I strive to keep the feeling of Eternity always before me !' 'Gentlemen,' exclaims old Rabbi Duncan to his students as he dismisses them at the end of the year's work, 'many will be wishing you a Happy New Year. Your old tutor wishes you a happy Eternity!'

Eternity!

Eternity!

VIII

Eternity!

Eternity!

It is good, as Stephen Grellet discovered on that memorable evening, to wander at times into the fields and the forests. To-day I have been out into the fields that are boundless, and, as the fruits of my stroll, I have brought back

A Bunch of Everlastings